30. This would arise where the previous basis adopted was acceptable for tax purposes and the new basis, also acceptable, and not merely a 'refinement' in the basis, involved the inclusion of further costs (e.g. works or administrative overheads) in the make-up of the valuation. In the year of change the uplift in the valuation at the commencement of the period (credited to profit and loss account as a special item) would escape taxation, as profit must be computed for taxation purposes using a consistent basis of stock valuation at the beginning and end of the accounting period (Bombay Commissioners v. Ahmedabad New Cotton Mills (8 A.T.C. 575)). However, the stock valuation carried forward each year is now greater than before due to the inclusion of further costs, and although over the life of the company the uplift escapes taxation, larger profits will be shown by the accounts if the volume of stock increases year by year.

31. A reverse position would arise if certain costs were eliminated from the stock valuation, i.e. the reduction in the opening stock debited to profit and loss account would not be allowed for taxation purposes.

32. If the procedure outlined in paragraph 30 were to be adopted, it would be advisable to ensure that the existing basis of stock valuation had been fully disclosed to the Inland Revenue and was not open to criticism.

33. In order to escape taxation on the uplift in the opening valuation, it might be suggested that the basis of stock valuation throughout the group be changed. However, it is submitted that although it is quite legitimate for individual companies to revise their bases of stock valuation to accord with group policy – and indeed it is usually advisable that they do so – the tax planner should not recommend a wholesale revision of the basis of stock valuation adopted by the group for tax reasons alone, unless there were other accountancy considerations which indicated that a change was desirable.

34. The disadvantage of paying tax on inter-group profits can, as mentioned in paragraph 15, be overcome by a merger of manufacturing and selling companies. The same result may be produced by transferring the relevant stocks back to the manufacturing companies at the end of the financial year, followed by a similar transfer to the selling companies at the commencement of the next financial year. If the manufacturing companies purchased their raw materials from subsidiary buying companies, the same principle could be applied (i.e. the stocks would be transferred back to the buying companies at the end of the year, and retransferred the following day). However, this could not apply once stocks on which profits had been made were absorbed into work in progress.

Acquisition of New Companies

35. The taxation aspects involved when new companies are acquired are too numerous to cover fully in this article, but the following matters are worthy of careful consideration.

36. If the assets, liabilities and goodwill of a business are acquired, this will usually entail the application of the new business provisions, whereunder the profits of one year will be assessed to income tax more than once. If the share capital of the business is acquired, however, assessments will continue to be made on the subsidiary in the normal way, and this will also apply if the trade of the subsidiary, together with the assets and liabilities, are subsequently transferred to the parent company under the provisions of section 17, Finance Act, 1954.

37. If part of the trade of an outside company is being acquired, therefore, that part can be hived off to a new subsidiary company (section 15, Finance Act, 1964, applying), which is then acquired by the purchasing company to which the trade of the newly-acquired subsidiary is subsequently transferred. This procedure ensures that income tax assessments are made on a continuing basis and that double assessments do not arise.

38. If the new subsidiary changes its accounting date to correspond with that of the parent, considerable tax saving may result by choosing the most beneficial length of accounting period and time during which to make the change.

39. If a company is acquired during its accounting period, a change of accounting date will be necessary, even if only temporary, if it is wished to make a subvention payment to that company in respect of the period from the date of acquisition to the end of the relevant accounting period (section 20 (10), Finance Act, 1953).

40. The feeding of profitable business into a newly-acquired company with available past losses must be watched with care to ensure that a change of trade does not take place. A similar way of using past losses – by inter-company sales or charges at fictitious prices – is usually not to be recommended in view of the remarks in paragraph 16, whilst excessive and unreasonable management charges might be disallowed in whole or in part for taxation purposes in the paying company and taxed in full on the recipient company.

Trading Overseas

41. This is a specialized subject and it is only possible to generalize in this article. Broadly speaking, trading overseas can be carried out through branches or separate subsidiary companies controlled and managed from the United Kingdom (in which case the whole of the profits arising will be liable to United Kingdom taxation), or through subsidiary companies controlled and managed abroad (when only distributions of profit to the United Kingdom will attract United Kingdom taxation). In the former case the subsidiary companies will, if qualifying, be treated as 'overseas trade corporations', when only distributions of profit will attract United Kingdom taxation. Relief will be given for overseas taxes suffered, limited to the United Kingdom tax on the doubly taxed profits.

42. The particular method to be adopted obviously varies with circumstances, although overseas control (which must be strictly adhered to) and overseas trade corporations are generally advantageous. However, if losses or large capital allowances are envisaged during the early years of a new overseas subsidiary, it would usually be advisable to retain United Kingdom residence and control and elect, if appropriate, not to be an overseas trade corporation so that these losses and allowances may be utilized against the profits of other group companies by means of subvention payments. Once these allowances had been utilized, the election not to be an overseas trade corporation could be withdrawn. The transfer of control overseas for taxation purposes would, however, be much more difficult to achieve (section 468, Income Tax Act, 1952).

43. In countries having high tax rates, e.g. India, liability to United Kingdom taxation normally ceases to be of major importance in deciding the method to be adopted if double taxation relief is available.

Overseas Investment Income

44. If United Kingdom taxation is assessed under Schedule D, Case V, on overseas profits when distributed as dividends, in the opening years of distribution income tax will be assessed twice on the dividends arising in one year (although double taxation relief will be available in each year – section 18, Finance Act, 1961). This may be avoided, however, by careful timing of dividends (e.g. no dividend declared in the second or third years of assessment), or by arranging for the dividends to be paid through a paying agent in the United Kingdom, in which event an 'actual' basis of assessment applies. If arrangements such as these were made, it must be ensured that there can be no danger of the relevant overseas companies being regarded as controlled and managed, and thereby resident, in the United Kingdom.

45. If it is desired that a separate company should hold the group's overseas investments, a considerable tax saving could result if the cessation provisions of Schedule D, Case V, applied, as certain income would escape assessment. This could also result in dividends declared by the parent company having a higher net United Kingdom rate of tax. However, the proposed corporation tax might have some effect on this procedure.

General Considerations

46. Tax benefits can no longer be obtained from dividend stripping, although income tax paid in previous years can still be recovered in certain circumstances. This can be attained by the declaration of a dividend from subsidiary to parent (out of post-acquisition profits – see section 4, Finance (No. 2) Act, 1955, as extended by section 19, Finance Act, 1958) to absorb unutilized losses and capital allowances, or by the making of subvention payments out of such dividend. However, this may cease to be advantageous under corporation tax legislation if companies are required to account to the Revenue for tax deducted from dividends paid.

47. On the acquisition of the shares of a profit-making company by a company incurring a loss in the year of acquisition, the loss cannot be offset against the profit by way of a subvention payment (section 20 (10), Finance Act, 1953) or, normally, by way of a dividend, as sufficient post-acquisition profits will not be available. However, if on acquisition the trade of the subsidiary was transferred to the parent under the provisions of section 17, Finance Act, 1954, the loss could be used against the profit by way of carry forward under section 15 (3), Finance Act, 1953, or might even be used against a part of any profit made in the year preceding the year of acquisition – under section 341, Income Tax Act, 1952; as could any loss of the parent company incurred in that year – under section 15 (3), Finance Act, 1953. These remarks arise from the fact that on the transfer of a trade income tax assessments are apportioned to the transferee company from the date of transfer, and this company is thereby assessed on profits earned by the transferor company in previous years.

48. If a subsidiary incurs a loss which is subvented by the holding company from its investment income, instead of from the profits of another trading subsidiary, tax relief for the loss is obtained at an earlier date. Dividends, if out of post-acquisition profits (see paragraph 46), could be declared by the subsidiaries to provide subventible income for this purpose. To obtain relief for the subvention payment for profits tax purposes, a profits tax grouping notice, which is irrevocable, would have to be given, and it must also be ensured that the dividend from which the subvention payment is made has no net United Kingdom rate as repayment would be restricted in that event.

49. If inter-company loans exist within a group it is advisable that they be interest free, except for overseas loans or where minority shareholders are involved, so that problems do not arise in connection with the tax deducted from the interest (i.e. under section 170, Income Tax Act, 1952) in times of losses. Alternatively, it is sometimes advisable to merely accrue the loan interest and not make payment.

50. The fact that on the formation of a new company one of the opening years of trading is assessed to income tax more than once may sometimes be avoided by another group company carrying on the business in return for a management fee equal to the whole, or substantially the whole, of the new company's profits. This management fee must be reasonable in relation to the work carried out for the subsidiary. Alternatively, if the new company has purchased from, or sold to, other group companies, it may be possible to arrange these purchase or selling prices in such a way that little or no profit accrues to the new company (but see paragraph 16).

51. If companies in a group make substantial subscriptions or donations to charities each year and do not obtain income tax relief in respect thereof, the formation of a charitable trust could prove advantageous. The relevant companies would enter into deeds of covenant with the trust, thereby deducting income tax at the standard rate from the annual payments. The trust would reclaim the tax so deducted, and so be in a position to make the same donations to charities as if the deeds of covenant had not been made. For advertising purposes, the name of the group or of an individual company could be incorporated in the name of the charity. However, it may be that the corporation tax legislation may render this procedure ineffective.

52. There are many other occasions, too numerous to mention in this article, when the tax planner can prove his worth to a group. Much of his time is spent in devising means of ensuring that all charges are allowed for taxation purposes and, where possible, profits are received in the form of capital. An example of the former is that payments for 'know-how' are normally allowable if taking the form of payments for technical fees, whilst a premium received for the assignment of a lease, but not the granting of a sublease, is usually not taxable, thereby falling into the latter category.

Conclusion

53. The most difficult obstacle the tax planner has to overcome is management. He must educate them into becoming 'tax conscious', so that before any material policy decisions are taken, new ventures and transactions undertaken or new agreements signed, he is consulted. Once he has trained management in this way, the tax planner will be fulfilling his real function.

54. There are also important opportunities in this field for the practising accountant, especially where clients do not employ taxation departments of their own. Many ideas as to tax saving can be formulated during the course of an audit, and the accountant should not hesitate in making his suggestions known to his clients.

Management Accounting in Perspective

by R. V. DENBY, F.C.W.A.

ALTHOUGH for many years I have been concerned with establishing and operating accounting procedures designed to aid management in the formulation of policy, development and control of a business, for the past few years I have been a member of management responsible for taking corrective action arising out of control information supplied by the accounting department.

There is no doubt that for the specialist to succeed in general management it is necessary for him to balance his particular expertise with all other activities of a business and this can give rise to an unconscious simplification of the requirements underlying the particular function with which he is most familiar.

When I was approached to give a paper on management accounting, it was necessary carefully to consider whether or not it was possible to present a picture which was not unduly coloured by recent experiences. Also, a great number of papers have already been presented, articles published and books printed on the subject of management accounting. Nevertheless, after due consideration I felt that it might be possible to reflect my present mood and yet at the same time offer some constructive views around a title such as 'Management Accounting in Perspective'.

Definition

In the booklet covering the new Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services, the following definition is given:

> 'Management accounting services' means the application of accounting knowledge for the purpose of organizing, selecting, compiling and presenting accounting, quantitative and statistical information, derived from all the relevant records of a business to assist those responsible for management in controlling the business and in the making of day-to-day decisions and in the formulation of policy, together with the application of knowledge and experience of:
> (a) techniques for the organization, control and measurement of production and ancillary services, and for the control, measurement and remuneration of human effort;
> (b) commercial and management practices; and
> (c) office organization, methods and equipment.

This seems to cover the subject pretty thoroughly, but are the purveyors of such attractive sounding wares quite sure that the articles actually offered are of sufficiently high quality and up to the required specification?

Are they also sure that 'those responsible for management' – those who control a business – are on the same beam and share that feeling of togetherness which is vital to the successful and profitable operation of a company?

Heterogeneous Accountancy

I sometimes feel that accountancy is a somewhat diverse subject compared with production, selling, purchasing, engineering etc. Because of its universality, in an attempt to keep abreast of new techniques in the activities of rapidly developing organizations, there is a natural tendency to spread the tentacles of accounting over an ever-growing field. But in this ever increasing era of specialization, there may be a danger of accountants becoming labelled as 'Jacks of all trades'.

It is only necessary to scan the classified advertisement pages of the Press, to reinforce this statement. Advertisements covering comptrollers, controllers, financial executives, chief accountants, secretaries, management accountants, management services accountants, cost accountants and even operational researchers, contain very similar job specifications. And what about the commercial manager?

In a programme starting on January 5th, B.B.C.-2 presented what it described as 'an opportunity to study how modern economic ideas and techniques can be applied to industrial and business management'. In the first of the eight half-hourly weekly instalments, the fictitious firm's chief accountant was 'sacked', having been superseded by the commercial manager, a London School of Economics character, who studied some accountancy as a side line – he being the 'man of the moment'. The programme received comment week by week in The Accountant.

There is a growing tendency for the commercial manager to assume wider responsibilities for co-ordinating activities of (a) sales administration and price fixing; (b) recording and presentation of accounting and cost control information; and (c) the function of management services. This latter embracing industrial engineering, accounting systems and procedures, organization and methods, work study, operational research and other methods which may be used to increase the profitability of a concern, through development and cost reduction, coupled with the improvement of quality and customer service.

A paper presented on March 4th at the sixth annual Management Accounting Conference held at Slough College School of Accountancy Studies, attended by senior executives of industrial organizations in the district.

Another View

With the increasing development in the use of computers and the growth of management services in a number of organizations, the accountant is facing very real competition from teams of specialists in closely associated fields and experts in these techniques have their own views on relative job specifications. For example, the following is an interpretation of definitions collected from the publication, A Guide to Operational Research, by Eric Duckworth:

'Operational Research is concerned with producing a specimen mathematical or statistical model of a business, so as to obtain optimum overall efficiency. It is involved with planning a whole system to meet a given objective.

'Work Study aims at minimizing the effort taking place within the system.

'Industrial Engineering is concerned with the efficient use of physical assets.

'Organization and methods is concerned with the effective use of clerical and administrative assets.

'Management Accounting is concerned with the efficient use of the financial assets of a firm.'

Whilst, from an accountant's point of view, the technical correctness of the definitions and terminology may be open to considerable doubt, the thoughts behind the implications should be clear to all.

Derivation of Management Accounting

Don't get me wrong! I believe that the accountant has played, is playing, can play, and will play, a most important part in improving the efficiency of organizations throughout the world, but is management accounting such a new thing? Senior members of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants have been practising this for years. Many chartered accountants and certified accountants who have thrown off the shackles of professionalism, have concentrated their energies on this important accounting activity.

What has really happened is that the term 'management accounting' has been evolved to provide a more accurate description of the use of the accountant's skill in recording both past and forecasted events in terms of currency or other standard unit, so that the results of all activities are measured in a common medium, deviations from the purpose are disclosed and corrective action promoted. Basically, the animal is the same but we now have a title which more exactly describes the function to industry and the public at large.

The journal of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants changed its name to Management Accounting with the January 1965 issue, and in the leading article, the President stated:

'It then became apparent that the distinction between cost and works accountancy and traditional accountancy was essentially a difference of purpose. The purpose of cost and works accountancy was to provide information as the basis for management action, while the purpose of traditional accountancy was mainly that of the custody of the interests of the business and the rendering of an account of stewardship to its owners. Nevertheless, traditional accounts had a certain value for management purposes, as, for example, the information derived from a profit and loss account and balance sheet: and cost and works accounts had a value for custody and stewardship purposes, such as the information derived from stores accounts or capital expenditure costs.

'The year 1950 which saw the visit to the U.S.A. of the Management Accounting Team under the leadership of Mr I. T. Morrow, . . . was that in which the term "management accounting" came into common use. It might be defined as the use of the accounts of an undertaking, extended by cost accounts, to provide information for management action.'

Scope

What then is the scope of the management accountant? This will, of course, depend to some extent on the type and size of organization and its structure, as well as on the strength and personality of the various company officials.

In normal circumstances, the mangement accountant does not have to take his own medicine, and while an action which he may suggest may provide a logical solution to a problem, this may appear different when viewed through the eyes of an executive director who has to consider the effect on the board, shareholders, customers and workpeople.

The accountant has line responsibility to the managing or financial director in so far as the financial function is concerned, but in the management accounting role – in which he is providing information on which the design, sales, production, commercial and other managers can take executive action – he is in a staff position. His function is essentially advisory, presenting facts on significant trends in a manner which can be understood by the recipients, and his special skill and knowledge of company affairs is vitally necessary in forecasting future happenings and in establishing an overall profit plan. Nevertheless, in the end it is usually the line manager who must make the final decision.

If the management accountant is to reap the full harvest from his endeavours, he must possess:

(a) a thorough knowledge of the industry and processes with which he is connected and will be called upon to report;

(b) the power to assimilate and sieve detail in order to present the information in a concise and clear manner;

(c) the ability to deal with people in the boardroom, in his own and associated departments and on the shop floor.

Having considered some of the attributes which the management accountant should possess if he is to make the most effective use of the resources at his disposal, mention should be made of perfectionism.

I think perhaps the accountant is at a disadvantage in this connection, as he is so used to preparing accounts which must be accurate that he is inclined to pursue those ideals in all his work, instead of considering the needs of operative management and what information can be provided to aid them in their daily work.

There are times when one feels inclined to throw existing procedures and systems overboard and start again from 'square one', but beware if this arises solely from a desire for perfectionism and not for commercial reasons.

Rapid changes take place in industry and we must be capable of sufficient flexibility to meet the demands without dotting every 'i' and crossing every 't'.

Communications

The subject of communication is one of the most important in the industrial and business world today. One essential feature of accounting presentation is speed – speed in moulding it into a co-ordinated and understandable shape and speed in transmitting it to others while events are still alive, memories are still fresh and there is time to take appropriate corrective action where necessary. It is certainly better to have information based on some approximations in time to take action, than it is to have absolutely accurate information as stale as the news in last week's papers. Reports should focus attention on most significant items and provide a basis for consistent measurement. The grouping and presentation of items should remain relatively constant since it is particularly annoying for a non-accounting executive to have to follow display gymnastics.

Reports may either be presented as routine at regular intervals or ad hoc, for specific purposes. The amount of detail and mode of presentation depends on the level of management to whom presented. Reports should be short, concise, but adequate and to the point for top management. Nevertheless, supporting detail must be available if required.

Naturally, more detail must be given to the lower levels of management, but it should normally be restricted to within the recipient's sphere of responsibility.

Figures are meaningless unless some comparative basis is available. Management needs facts, the value of an executive depends largely upon his powers of accurate analysis, yet once his own mind is made up, the larger and more difficult part of the work is to convince the minds of others that the proposed solution is the best one.

Having expressed a number of views on the broad features of the subject, there are some particular aspects which warrant consideration.

Design and Development

The accountant of the future, working closely in conjunction with the management services specialists, is likely to be called upon more and more for advice on significant trends and the effect of courses of alternative action. Therefore it is essential that the accountant is kept in the main stream of events. He must be on the 'ground floor' and become a member of the planning team concerned with the project yet to be developed, or the factory still to be built. There is no better starting-point than at the design or product development stage.

Design work should normally be activated either with a view to improve profitability through product development or through reduced costs. The design function, above all else, offers considerable scope for establishing the policy of cost reduction from the outset, long before the wheels of manufacture start turning. It seems to be so much more important to get design right in the first place, than to spend time and energy improving on it afterwards.

Capital Employed

The effective growth of an organization depends on a number of closely related considerations:

> Good labour relations, sound planning, purposeful research and development, strategic marketing and sales policy, the provision of a proper control system and information service, quality control, competent management and the efficient use of capital.

Business acquires capital in two ways:

(1) ploughing back part of the profits as reserves;

(2) bringing more money into the business from the capital market or elsewhere.

Ploughing back from earnings is a way in which many companies increase financial resources. On the other hand, it may be necessary for the company to go to the capital market and buy what it needs. Money can be raised by bank overdraft, by the issue of additional shares or by other means. Management have a responsibility to ensure that investors obtain the highest possible return on their money.

The ratio of profit to capital employed and particularly the trend in that ratio, is one of the most valuable indices of the efficiency with which a company is managed. Ultimately all decisions involving change should be evaluated and expressed in this form.

This evaluation is clearly within the sphere of the management accountant's responsibility and he has a vital part to play, not only in the measurement, but in the maintenance where satisfactory or improvement where not satisfactory, of the return on capital employed.

The capital employed in a business should represent the total assets available to management in the exercise of their function. It is thus the aggregate of share capital, loan capital and capital and revenue reserves, represented by fixed assets (i.e. land and buildings, plant and equipment) and by current assets such as investments, cash in hand and at bank, stock, work in progress, debtors; less current liabilities such as creditors and taxation liability. For fixed assets the value might be original cost, cost less depreciation, cost of replacement or alternative revaluation basis.

Incidentally, if the term is used literally, it would not include any assets which are idle, but exclusion of these would obviously increase the ratio of profit to capital employed and distort the picture.

Control of Capital Expenditure

The various alternative methods of measuring the return on investment, such as the pay-off period, return on original investment, return on average investment and discounted cash flow would justify the preparation of a separate paper. It does not seem inappropriate, however, to deal briefly with the control of capital expenditure.

Often insufficient attention is paid to the outcome of a capital project: once the original proposition has been approved by the board, the effects are often merged in a welter of other activities so that it is difficult to measure the true results of the implementation. Here again, responsibility rests with the accountant and the establishment of a reference period, that is, details of output rates, sales, scrap, material and labour costs, hours and shifts worked, prior to the introduction of the new project should be insisted upon. Procedure should be introduced to ensure that capital expenditure is not incurred without proper authority, control should be exercised in several stages and statements prepared for each project showing:

(b) committed expenditure through the medium of purchase orders or contracts;

(c) recorded costs represented by invoices or certificates, plus provision for delivered equipment or completed work not invoiced;

(d) estimated balance required to complete the project;

(e) difference of $a-(b+d)$, denoting either a prospective saving or overspending;

(f) cash paid;

(g) proportion of cash remaining out of total anticipated expenditure to be paid in subsequent accounting periods.

Forecasting, Profit Planning and Budgeting

The only possible way in which a car can be driven successfully in a forward direction is to look ahead. A good driver realizes that it is not enough to see every detail of the road scene, he must assess the value of what he sees and upon that value formulate his driving plan. He must be alert at all times and possess strong powers of concentration and observation.

The driver who plans his route before setting out on his journey, considers the various alternatives, selects the most appropriate in the circumstances and holds a plan in reserve in case of emergency, is more certain to arrive at his destination in good time and with the minimum of trouble than the fellow who drives by rule of thumb and directional instinct.

A simile exists in the conduct of any business, the consistent and continual success of which must surely be dependent on the extent to which the affairs are planned ahead.

A study of the factors underlining and necessitating the preparation of forecasts shows that they may derive from motives of expansion, contraction or substitution, or from purely financial reasons. They may be:

(a) Simple – dealing with one change of events, such as the marketing of a new product, introduction of a new item of plant or opening up of a new sales outlet.

(b) Compound – concerned with a series of events and their relationship over a fairly short period of time, say one year.

(c) Complex – involving a survey of all the changes in conditions and events likely to affect the business over a period of, say, three, five, or ten years.

Forecasting, profit planning and budgeting are closely inter-connected and, either individually or collectively, they are very necessary factors in the operation of a successful business.

Forecasts may be required to cover any or all of the events mentioned previously and are prepared in order to provide guidance to management in arriving at policy decisions. They are concerned with probable events and may be made where alternative courses of action require evaluation.

Profit planning has been defined as the systematic process of considering all the factors governing the activities of a business, setting realistic goals, making plans to secure them and controlling progress.

You must plan for profit, because without planning sooner or later there will be no profits. But, profit planning cannot be treated as a survival kit to be used to avoid disaster; rather it should be looked upon as an intelligent organized approach to optimizing business results. Profit planning, therefore, is concerned with all the phases of a business, objectives are laid down in respect of expansion of products, processes and outlets, together with the requirements of labour, plant and cash resources to meet the plan.

Budgeting represents the evaluation of a policy or plan and is concerned with providing the yardstick through which budgetary control can be exercised.

Budgets are thus the short-term financial or quantitative interpretation of a planned programme of intent and provide a yardstick for detailed comparison period by period. Adjustments will be necessary to take account of changes in material prices, labour costs, overhead costs and major reorganization, from year to year.

Budgets will invariably be preceded by forecasts and certainly by the profit plan, but forecasts may be made for purposes which do not involve the preparation of detailed follow-through plans or budgets.

Management Accountant's Place in Profit Planning

Successful profit planning depends largely upon drive and vision from the top, reinforced by team-work from all executives concerned. One of the important ways to develop that team-work is to ensure that the executives are given regular information on the company's financial performance. It gives them a common objective to work together to earn an adequate profit.

Accounting has a vital part to play both in the formulation of the plan and in its subsequent measurement. Only management accounting can provide the reliable figures which are required to indicate progress and to show whether actual performance has exceeded or fallen short of the planned programme.

Volume Changes and Profitability

One way to absorb increased overheads without reducing profits or increasing sales prices is to plan an increase in volume of production and sales. Nevertheless, as production continues to rise, there will come a time (such as when a new factory building has to be erected) when overheads rise more rapidly than output. In some cases, beyond a certain point it may well be that sales cannot be increased other than by promotion methods which are very expensive.

Relationship between changes in volume and changes in aggregate profit can be very subtle and complex. For demonstrating that relationship, there are techniques such as marginal costing, break-even charts, profit graphs and profit-volume ratio. But these all over-simplify the situation and it is seldom possible to explain the relationship in terms that are both accurate and simple.

The techniques are valuable provided they are used with judgment and with the realization of the limitations, but whatever difficulties there are in expressing the relationship mathematically, a sound grasp of this relationship is essential to the management accountant. This is especially true of the problem of fixing sales prices, a field in which the commercial manager is likely to be closely concerned. It is also true of an expanding company, particularly one which is introducing more highly mechanized methods of production and adding to fixed costs.

Fixing Selling Prices

Planning of profits is obviously affected by the prices a company charges for its various products.

There is a wide use in the retail trade of what is known as a 'loss leader', that is, the sale of a product at a price below cost, in order to attract customers for other goods sold at a profit. Americans say they do not mind finding a small item of loss in a huge sea of profit, but, in fixing prices, it is important to provide safeguards so that the small island of loss does not grow bigger and bigger and the big sea of profit shrinks until there is no sea at all.

Woolly-minded theorizing on this subject can be dangerous and one sales manager had firmly implanted in his mind the idea that provided everything sold above the figure of 'marginal cost' as calculated by the cost accountant, then so long as the sales volume was high, a big profit was inevitable. This type of thinking can be disastrous and the accountant was able to persuade the managing director that if the sales manager was given his head, he would have ended up by selling everything at the marginal cost. At the end of the year there would have been a loss for the company as a whole exactly equal to the fixed overheads of the business.

Cost of Accounting

We should consider George's words of wisdom in Three Men in a Boat:

> 'We must not think of the things we CAN DO WITH but only of the things we CAN'T DO WITHOUT.'

British industry is facing the continual threat from abroad of reduced profit margins and though increased volume may offset this to a certain extent, the return on capital employed will fall unless operating costs are contained. The initiative must come from 'top management' who will have to manage 'by exception' and no longer allow a costly mass of information to be maintained in case a question is asked. One should consider that with tax at almost 50 per cent, every £ saved is equivalent to selling another £10 where net margins after tax are 5 per cent. Every accounting or office procedure which does not spark off action to increase profitability or usefully appraise past performance should be eliminated, unless it is necessary to meet statutory requirements.

Accounting Information Required by Management

In my opinion, the provision of the following information is an essential function of management accounting:

(1) Capital
- (a) The working capital required to finance a company's commercial operations.
- (b) The capital required to finance any additions to the plant, equipment and buildings and how this capital is to be raised.
- (c) The return on capital employed.
- (d) Reports on capital expenditure control.

(2) Profit Planning
- (a) Actual sales achieved compared with the budget, possibly analysed by product and territory.
- (b) Variation in production costs, material, labour and other direct expenses compared with budget standards.
- (c) Variation in expenditure on indirect material, labour and other overheads compared with flexible budgets.
- (d) Distinction between controllable and uncontrollable variations.

(e) Variation in profit as compared with budget and overall profit plan, together with reasons.

(3) Profit Structure of the Company
(a) The fixed overheads.
(b) The variable costs of production.
(c) Break-even points for various aspects of the business.
(d) Margins of safety.
(e) Effect on profit of increases or decreases in sales.
(f) Effect which alterations in variety, mix of sales, or selling prices may have on profit.

(4) Overall Financial Results
(a) Trading and profit and loss account.
(b) Balance sheet.
(c) Variation in stock and work in progress.
(d) Variation in debtors and creditors.
(e) Management ratios.

(5) Suggested courses of action available to take corrective action or advantage of favourable circumstances revealed by the figures.

Conclusion

In submitting this paper I have tried to indicate that whilst management accountants can make an important contribution towards the profitable expansion of trade in Britain and abroad, it is essential that they concentrate their energies on producing, at the lowest possible cost, significant information which is both lucid and objective. I also believe that other technicians are becoming closely associated with the same broad sphere of operation which may impose a limitation on the management accountant's job specification.

The training undertaken by qualified accountants may well fit them admirably for lateral or vertical movement in a company but they must develop the broad outlook necessary for general management and not confine themselves to the narrow perspective engendered by too close absorption in figures to the exclusion of the facts and people who give rise to them.

Weekly Notes

BUDGET DAY

IT was announced in the House of Commons last week by Mr Herbert Bowden, Leader of the House, that Budget Day will be Tuesday, April 6th.

We shall discuss the Budget and its implications in our issue of April 10th.

ESTATE DUTY REFORM

CONFISCATORY rates of tax are tolerable only if there are adequate means of avoiding them and nowhere is this dictum better illustrated than in the present estate duty. Inevitably such circumstances give rise to anomalies and inequities which bring the tax into disrepute. A new Hobart Paper, Taxing Inheritance and Capital Gains[1], offers proposals for a comprehensive reform of this tax and other forms of capital receipt.

The author, Mr C. T. Sandford, recommends an inheritance tax to replace estate duty and that the rates should be progressive but applied to successive slabs on a cumulative basis. The progression of the tax would be determined by the total capital sums received by the taxpayer in his lifetime. In other words, apart from any such inheritance for purposes of this tax, all capital gains inclusive of winnings on the football pools and the sale of owner-occupied houses would be brought into charge. A basic exemption limit similar to that provided under the present estate duty would relieve the smallest gains.

With the prospect of a new and probably more complicated capital gains tax it will almost certainly be necessary to introduce a gift tax. This, suggests Mr Sandford, could be integrated with other capital receipts for tax purposes. The result of his proposals would be an undoubted simplification of the existing capital taxes and would make it possible to bring into charge all forms of capital receipt. The rates of duty which would apply would clearly depend on the revenue required, but few readers will agree with Mr Sandford that his proposed scale of tax should go as high as the existing rates of estate duty.

The adoption of such proposals would doubtless necessitate some complex anti-avoidance legislation. Undoubtedly, their main merit is that they are based on an overall assessment of the tax scene and the recognition of the need for comprehensive reform. In this respect at least they are a considerable improvement on the all too frequent ad hoc additions and amendments which characterize the modern Finance Act.

RECRUITING FOR INDUSTRY

WITH an ever-increasing number of able young men entering institutions of higher education, industry's intake of new recruits must inevitably be affected if they persist in recruiting only at the school-leaving age. For this reason, industry is paying increasing attention to the products from institutions of higher education such as the universities and C.A.T.s.

The question as to what training these later entrants should undergo is far from resolved. A letter in The Guardian last Monday from thirty-five full-time students reading for the Higher National Diploma of business studies at Regent Street Polytechnic, draws attention to the fact that the majority of their members are having difficulty not merely in obtaining employment but even in obtaining interviews from prospective employers. Not unreasonably in the light of this experience, they ask 'What does business and industry want – competent business men or the prestige of having graduates with excellent but irrelevent qualifications?'

The Times recently discussed the question of what should be taught in the new emerging business schools, on which there is considerable divergence of opinion. In any case, it seems generally to be agreed that these establishments are better suited to the older student who is already engaged in management. In the light of The Guardian letter it would seem sound advice to offer any school-leaver that his best mode of entry into industry would still be through the acquisition of a recognized professional qualification such as that offered by the recognized accountancy bodies.

SOLICITORS AND THEIR CLIENTS' MONEY

THE decision of the House of Lords in Brown v. C.I.R. (43 A.T.C. 244) that a solicitor must account to his client for bank deposit interest on the client's money has naturally caused a good deal of what we might call 'interest' in the profession. At the committee stage of the Solicitors Bill in the House of Lords, on March 11th, Lord Tanglye moved the following new clause:

> 'A solicitor shall not be liable by virtue of the relation between solicitor and client to account to any client for interest received by the solicitor on moneys deposited at a bank being moneys received or held for or on account of his clients generally.'

He explained that where the moneys of several clients are mixed up in one account it is very difficult for the solicitor to calculate how to apportion the interest. It was proposed to include a further clause which, coupled with rules to be made by The Law Society, would require a solicitor to put a client's money on deposit and pay him the interest where the amount was £500 or more and the period during which it was held was two months or more. Lord Tanglye's proposals were generally welcomed as a fair compromise of the difficulties created by the House of Lords' decision.

MILNER HOLLAND REPORT

THE report of the Committee on Housing in Greater London[1] which was published last week, contains a number of startling revelations of the hardships of some tenants and the shortage of rented accommodation. There are also some pertinent observations about the burden of taxation and its indirect effects in relation to the provision of housing. The report says (page 33) that taxes impose a heavy additional burden upon non-profit-making housing associations, in addition to the interest and capital repayments on money borrowed. Taxes also fall on revenue put to reserve to meet recurring costs of outside painting and other major repairs. This, of course, tends to put up the rents. Private landlords are in a simlar position; there is no relief for the amortization of loans nor for expenditure on improvement or modernization. The cost must be recovered through the rents, and within the life of the asset. In the case of a leasehold this may be quite short. The report sets out some interesting figures in support of its conclusions. The abolition of Schedule A has added to the advantage of owner-occupation. It might well be, however, that if there was still tax relief for repairs and painting, our cities would tend to be rather more attractive than they are.

TRADE BALANCE IN SURPLUS

IN February there was a seasonally adjusted surplus in the trade balance of £11 million. This sudden emergence of a positive figure owes a good deal to the low import figure for the month caused by the dock strikes in the United States.

Exports in February were valued, reasonably adjusted, at £390 million. The recent improvement in the figures was therefore continued and over the three months December to February there was an increase of almost 6 per cent compared with the previous three months.

In the case of imports, the United States strikes apart, a genuine decline has been taking place over the last few months according to official comment on the figures. It is claimed that the import surcharge has been a contributing factor but the brunt of the fall in imports seems to have been taken by the rest of the sterling area.

ADVERTISING TODAY

THE guest speaker at a luncheon meeting of the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants on Tuesday of last week was Mr George R. Pope, deputy manager of The Times, who spoke on the subject of 'Advertising'. Advertising today, he said, provided a service for big business; while he thought that this must appeal to accountants, their criticism of the amount spent on advertising was probably the length of accountability of the amount of money spent, the evaluation of what this money really brought to the company, and how to arrive at the amount of money that should be spent. But these points, he said, in the last ten years had been answered by advertising. The chance of a gamble on advertising had practically gone.

It was important to realize, went on Mr Pope, that advertising was essential to the country if it was going to be successful. A lot was being said about productivity and about the fact that output should go up 4 per cent each year; but increased productivity would be pointless unless it was possible to sell the goods being produced, either at home or abroad.

It was equally important to understand that unless there was an extremely strong home market, companies were unlikely to stand the rebuffs which they were likely to get in the export field.

What everyone in the country had to learn, said Mr Pope, was that they had to use, to the best of their ability, the whole development of technology, the whole of automation, and the whole service of salesmanship wherever it might be. Accountants were looked upon as a very important part of the industrial field to whom many companies turned for advice and guidance; they could often say the word that helped the company along, and it was therefore their responsibility to see that they gave the right advice.

A WORD ABOUT TAXES

SPEAKING at a luncheon meeting of The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants held at the Connaught Rooms, London WC2, on Tuesday of last week, Mr L. Barford, Chief Inspector of Taxes, observed with satisfaction that the Inland Revenue produced a net annual profit of 98¾ per cent on total turnover; no industry could match that, he declared. But, of course, it depended on the co-

This is My Life . . .

I'VE recently been reading a book re-telling the history of the so-called 'Gay Twenties'. It unrolled the almost forgotten but fascinating pageant of that decade's politics, sport, fashions, aviation, radio, Bright Young Things, and the sudden flowering of scientific discoveries that seem so commonplace today. It reads strangely sadly. From the opening chapters of victory celebrations and high hopes of a new world, it slips remorselessly downhill to strikes, futile bickering, and near-insolvency. In the background looms always the tragic shadow of 1939 and another grim decade.

Subconsciously my mind was on the alert for news of the accounting world or its contacts with politics and industry. There was news in plenty. There was Horatio Bottomley with his Victory Bonds swindle in 1922 and Clarence Hatry's forgeries shaking the stock exchange in 1929. In 1926 the Royal Mail case made accounting history, and two years later Alfred Loewenstein, the currency operator, plunged to death in the Channel from his aeroplane. The profession had its hands full.

In politics the range of interest ran from the affluence of Government finance, with income tax at 4*s* in the £, to a rising middle-class standard of living and to long-drawn-out destitution at the other end of the social scale. The strikers, the hunger-marchers, love on the dole . . . the great depression . . . why was such a mess allowed to happen?

Looking back on the scene with the benefit of hindsight and the knowledge of the monetary expertise of this decade, the co-operation of the internationally-minded banks and the readily-accessible world organization funds, it is clear that ignorance of money matters was extreme in the twenties. The handling of the war debts problem with the Continent and with the U.S. was startlingly incompetent; the precarious teetering around the gold standard was inept, the lack of appreciation of Britain's untapped resources of wealth was pathetic. Why?

On the face of it, there were men of the highest ability at the helm. The list of Chancellors of the Exchequer includes such names as Birkenhead, Baldwin, Churchill and Snowden. There were civil servants, economists and bankers of experience and integrity, such as J. M. Keynes and Montagu Norman. Yet most of them hadn't a clue as to what was really happening or what they should do. Why?

Possibly one small reason among the many greater ones is that the accounting profession was inadequately consulted or failed to contribute expert opinion. We didn't try to mould either public or Government thinking. Chancellors decided on their policies in silence and secrecy; Bonar Law was apparently unaware of his Chancellor's views on War Debt settlement. Taxation changes were sprung on startled listeners on Budget day; the tradition of mystery is reminiscent of oriental despotism. There was the minimum of open discussion and joint consultations. Why should this outmoded system continue?

Modern thinking tends rather to the regular top-level Press conference, or the fireside television talks initiated by the Presidents of the U.S. Cards are now put openly, or reasonably so, on the table; 'secret covenants secretly arrived at' are minimized. The present time is surely opportune for regular talks on TV and radio by expert accountants interviewing industrialists on published balance sheets, statisticians on economic trends, ministers on the running costs of the nationalized industries. On one programme should be lively panel discussions with questions from the floor; on another the Chancellor of the Exchequer, draft Budget blown up on a series of huge screens facing the viewers, should be justifying his policy under incisive questioning. He plucks at his collar and concedes all. . . .

'I regret, gentlemen, clause 123 is now seen to be somewhat ambiguous. Frankly, I didn't understand it myself from the beginning. Could you redraft it for me, please; after all, I never could quite understand all these damn little dots. Perhaps your great profession would agree to lend the Cabinet some permanent advisers?'

operation and goodwill of the British taxpayer – and he was the envy of all overseas countries who would 'gladly exchange with us'. Nevertheless, it should be remembered, said the Chief Inspector, that the tax-raising methods of today were relatively painless compared with those of, say, Richard I, when the unfortunate subject might be cast in the dungeons and a tooth per day extracted until payment was made.

Turning to his principal theme of 'Management and mismanagement', Mr Barford gave the following basic precepts for good management: efficient communications, speed and economy of effort in conveying ideas, understanding of human nature, and the ability to give members of the organization a sense of performance so that they took an interest in the job. He described management as the half-way point between the policy decision and fact.

Finance and Commerce

Cover and Contents

THE accounts of Staveley Industries, which form this week's reprint, smack of old wine and new bottles. The accounts have been produced in a new form this year and to quote the company's 'consultant', to whom the task of redesigning the annual report was entrusted, it was felt that 'an artistic cover design, relevant in some way to the company, would not only be found pleasing wherever copies lie around, but it would stimulate recipients to look inside and study the contents'.

The result is that the cover is a lurid affair 'reproduced from one of several modern paintings which hang in the head offices of Staveley Industries in Portland House, London'. That, presumably, gives the cover some relevance to the company, although just what the picture is meant to convey is beyond the comprehension of this writer. Whether it will 'stimulate recipients to look inside and study the contents' is a debatable point. Probably it will.

The trouble is that a modern painting reproduced on the cover leads to some non-modern looking accounts inside. The reprint shows that the double-sided balance sheet is favoured to the extent of not even showing a net current assets figure.

Net Assets Employed

Separate profit and loss and appropriation accounts also suggest that while the directors may appreciate modern art they do not appreciate modern account presentation. A five-year view of group development is provided in 'Financial information', reprinted in the next column, and here the company gets down to something approaching the kind of information shareholders need, but one item in the information points to the inadequacy of the accounts themselves.

Pre-tax profits are equated to sales and to net assets employed, the latter figure being given as £16,016,000. That, of course, is the figure that should be brought out in the balance sheet. The arithmetic of the thing is simple enough but how many shareholders know how to do it, and, even if they do know, why should they have to work out the necessary sums for themselves?

If a company aims, by a startling cover, to tempt people to read the contents, then every effort should be made to see that what is inside is not only worth reading but readily readable.

Divisional Organization

The Staveley Industries group is organized into four divisions, and in his statement with the accounts Mr Aubrey Jones, M.P., provides a breakdown of profit by divisions. The Chemical Division in the year under review earned profits of £577,000 against £574,000; the Foundries & Abrasives Division £568,000 against £444,000; the Machine Tool division £422,000 against a loss of £24,000, and other subsidiaries earned £88,000 against £42,000. Income investment of £63,000 against £52,000 brought total profits up to £1,718,000 against £1,088,000.

This is important information and it should be brought out in the additional information to the accounts themselves and not necessarily in the chairman's statement. Perhaps next year the accounts, which need to be recast in modern form, will be supplemented by a breakdown, not only of profits but of divisional sales and capital employed to reconcile sales and capital, as well as profits, to the total figures.

Some small part of the energy which has been spent on successfully reorganizing the Staveley group in the past two years or so could well be spent on modernizing the account layout. There should, however, be a word of praise for the provision of a full list and description of the subsidiaries of the group provided in the report and also for the extension of the list to include the names, and also the extent of holdings, in associated companies.

Group Accountant

The chairman tells shareholders that 'A Group Accountant with board experience has been recruited, whose first main function will be to modernize methods of financial control throughout the group'. A major objective of the board is to increase the return on capital employed.

Following the grouping of subsidiaries into divisions, divisional boards are now functioning and 'some progress has been made towards concerted working'. Meanwhile there has been a review of capital spending programmes and it is estimated that 'perhaps more than £1 million' will be spent in each of the next two or three years compared with a depreciation provision of between £600,000 and £700,000.

The cash resources of the group, improved through the disposal of smaller subsidiaries and surplus properties, are considered sufficient to meet the estimated level of expenditure. Further expansion of group profit is expected for the current year – an expectation borne out by the results of the first three months. The accounts for the year to September 30th, 1964, incidentally, reached shareholders on February 23rd, 1965.

CITY NOTES

THE stock-markets continue their approach to the Budget in a mood of caution. There is currently a tendency to take a less unfavourable – as distinct from a more optimistic – view of Budget prospects, mainly on the grounds that present share prices may possibly discount the worst to be expected in terms of the Budget's deflationary content.

The impression is growing, however, that the Chancellor will not announce the rate of corporation tax in his Budget statement. There is still much feverish calculation of earnings at various corporation tax rates, with 40 per cent the most usual figure. But it looks as though for the next twelve months the exact rate will remain an unknown quantity.

Meanwhile the weeks leading up to the Budget are being enlivened by an unprecedented rush of new issues of varying description and worth. Details of eleven share offers, stock issues, placings and marketings were issued last Monday alone.

Take-over and merger developments are also numerous and it seems that only take-over news makes anything like an impression on share prices. The projection of industrial profits and dividends, with announcements two months earlier than usual, has not had the supposedly desired effect of pushing prices higher in order to obtain a realistic gains tax base on Budget day.

* * * *

AS noted in The Accountant of February 27th, the Stock Exchange is to publish a full record of Budget day prices in book form. The book will include the details of that day's Stock Exchange Official List together with details of securities quoted in the Monthly List which contains securities infrequently dealt in. The book will cost £1 and may be ordered in advance, so the Stock Exchange states, 'without liability being incurred in the event of the proposed capital gains tax being excluded from the Budget'. The book is expected to be available four to five weeks after April 6th. Already the Stock Exchange has arranged for a special print of the Official List.

THE take-over battle between the Reed Paper Group and Wall Paper Manufacturers has thrown up an interesting debate on profit forecasting. Wall Paper Manufacturers, in attempting to stave off the original combined Courtaulds-Reed bid, projected profits and dividends well ahead but Reed, following Courtaulds withdrawal, after questioning W.P.M.'s forecasts, decided to make none of their own. Reed were content to say that current year profits would permit a higher dividend but that 'the right course is to defer our final decision until the usual time in the second half of May'. In a bid containing a substantial share element, the Reed decision shows a nice sense of stock-market psychology in which hope of a higher dividend is a stronger factor than the announcement of a dividend itself.

THE rise to 6¾ per cent in the building society mortgage rate has had no detrimental effect on mortgage demand. The position, however, is obscured to some extent by the withdrawal of a number of lenders from the market – local authorities principally, and to a lesser degree the insurance companies.

On the other hand, the new rate of 3¾ per cent tax free on share account investment has not brought any marked inflow of new funds to the building societies. Competitive rates elsewhere are proving a strong counter-attraction for investment funds.

Mathematical Programming in Accounting

SIR, – The contributor of the article entitled as above in your issue of February 27th seems to have overlooked the fact that while limiting factors are usually of short duration, the loss of customers' goodwill can affect the profitability of a business for the rest of time.

By his method, the salesman will be left without a full range of goods to offer. Unless it is to be achieved at the expense of turning away repeat orders, changing the sales mix can be a very slow process. Changing back takes longer still.

Most people would prefer to keep the sales mix the way the customers like it, and would try to deal with the production difficulties by bringing out new models, modifying the designs and using different materials.

It would be useful to learn what linear programming is really used for and whether it has any practical application in accountancy work.

Yours faithfully,

London SW5. W. F. WEAVER.

[Mr J. M. Samuels writes: I would agree that some limiting factors may only be for the short-run, but it is surely an advantage to know the cost of the position that has been made in moving away from the optimal position. If this cost is greater than the loss of goodwill, then it is not worth the solution suggested by the writer. The cost is the shadow price resulting from the solution of the programming problem.

In the short-run it might be worth while having the below optimal position, but in the long-run it is surely an objective to move towards the optimal position. With regard to the last paragraph, it is very easy to learn what linear programming is used for, there being many operational research books on this problem. Does the writer of the letter object to any theoretical work being undertaken on the application of this technique in accounting?]

Sir William Cash Memorial Fund

SIR, – I feel that many of your readers may be interested to learn of the fund that has been opened to perpetuate the memory of Sir William Cash, K.B., M.A., F.C.A. For most of his life he was a hard-working

Where have all the Juniors Gone?

We are indebted to the author, Mr W. S. Booth, of Eastbourne, New Zealand, for sending us the following verses which were sung, to the tune of a well known song, at a Christmas party of a firm of public accountants in Wellington.

Where have all the juniors gone?
Long time passing;
Where have all the juniors gone?
Long time ago;
Where have all the juniors gone?
Off with seniors every one!
What do they ever learn?
What do they ever learn?

Where have all the seniors gone?
Long time missing;
Where have all the seniors gone?
Long time away;
Where have all the seniors gone?
Out on audits, every one!
When do they ever work?
When do they ever work?

Where have all the audits gone?
Long time ending;
Where have all the audits gone?
Long time in hand;
Where have all the audits gone?
In with partners every one!
When will they be O.K.'d?
When will they be O.K.'d?

Where have all the partners gone?
Long time thinking;
Where have all the partners gone?
Long time at lunch;
Where have all the partners gone?
Called for typists, every one!
When will they ever sign?
When will they ever sign?

Where have all the typists gone? Long time striking;
Where have all the typists gone? Long time astray;
Where have all the typists gone? Out with juniors, every one!
When will they ever learn? When will they ever learn?

senior partner in the firm of chartered accountants started by his great-grandfather; a well-known figure in the City, he became chairman among other companies of the Abbey National Building Society and the Amalgamated Asphalte group. Yet Sir William always found time for much voluntary work which included lifelong service to the Industrial Christian Fellowship and the Oxford and Bermondsey Club, and in later years to The Girls' Public Day School Trust. From 1948 until his death last year he was chairman of the Council of the Trust and from its inception in 1951 of The Friends of the G.P.D.S.T. – which indeed was his inspiration. In 1958 he received the honour of knighthood for his services to education.

Sir William was always generous in giving to others and it is clear that the wish to give in return is very strong. The fund will be administered by the joint committee responsible for the memorial to his wife after her death in 1962 which took the form of three Lady Cash Travelling Scholarships awarded annually to girls leaving trust schools and entering universities. It was an object very dear to Sir William's heart, recognizing as he did that travel is increasingly an essential part of a student's education, and the first purpose of the Sir William Cash Memorial Fund is to extend the scheme to provide similar scholarships bearing his name.

Participation in the memorial is not confined to the Trust and The Friends of the Trust. Full details can be obtained from the Honorary Secretary, while contributions in memory of Sir William's service in any sphere will be welcomed and should be sent to the Honorary Treasurer at 26 Queen Anne's Gate, London SW1.

Yours faithfully,

London SW1. HERBERT F. COLLINS,
Chairman,
THE GIRLS' PUBLIC DAY SCHOOL TRUST.

Vandervell v. C.I.R.

In the Court of Appeal – February 26th, 1965

Surtax – Dividends – Gift of shares to charity – Share transfer deed in blank – Option to charity to resell – Whether settlor retained an interest – Law of Property Act, 1925, section 53 (1) (c) – Income Tax Act, 1952, sections 404 (2), 411, 415.

The appellant controlled a private manufacturing company with an issued capital of £1,055,500 divided into four classes of shares. There were 600,000 ordinary shares of 5*s* each, and all but two of these were owned by the appellant, and these shares gave him control of the company including dividend control. There were also 100,000 'A' ordinary shares of 5*s* each, 2,600,000 'B' ordinary shares of 5*s* each and 230,500 5 per cent cumulative preference shares of £1 each. The 'B' ordinary shares were held as to 20 per cent by the appellant, and as to 80 per cent by a trustee company. Nearly all the preference shares were held by four insurance companies. The trustee company was a private company with the principal object of acting as a trustee, and its one hundred shares of £1 each were held almost equally by three persons who were the appellant's advisers and personal friends, and the three shareholders were also the directors of the trustee company. The principal function of the company was to act as trustee of a settlement which the appellant had made in favour of his children in 1949.

In 1958 the appellant became interested in an appeal made by the Royal College of Surgeons for the founding of a chair of pharmacology. At that time the 100,000 'A' ordinary shares were registered in the name of a bank as trustee of a deed securing annual payments to the appellant's former wife. The deed entitled the appellant, with his former wife's consent, to substitute other security, and for some time negotiations had been going on for that to be done. The purpose of these negotiations was to ease the estate duty position that would occur on the appellant's death, and to that end to float the manufacturing company as a public company at some time.

On September 29th, 1958, there was a meeting between the appellant, one of his advisers and the appeals secretary of the Royal College of Surgeons as to how the £150,000 required for the founding of the chair of pharmacology should be provided. The appellant's adviser suggested that the appellant should transfer the 100,000 'A' ordinary shares, and that dividends therefrom to provide the £150,000 should be declared. The appellant agreed to this suggestion, and left the matter to the adviser to arrange. On November 5th, 1958, a deed was executed, substituting the sum of £25,000 for the 100,000 'A' ordinary shares as security for the annual payments to the appellant's former wife, and by that deed the bank declared that it held the shares in trust for the appellant absolutely.

On the following day the appellant's adviser having formed the view that a public floatation would be complicated if the 100,000 'A' ordinary shares were given outright, arranged that the College should give the trustee company an option to purchase the shares back within five years for £5,000. On November 14th, 1958, the appellant wrote a letter to his adviser stating:

> 'I have decided to give to the College the 100,000 "A" shares . . . which have been released . . . in exchange for the £25,000.'

The letter went on to request the adviser to arrange for the transfer of the shares to the College. On November 19th, a transfer deed for the 100,000 'A' shares was executed in blank, by the bank, and it and the option deed were handed to the appeals secretary at the College. On November 25th, the transfer deed was sealed by the College, and also the option deed, and on the following day these documents were returned to the appellant's adviser. The adviser put the option deed in his private safe. In October 1961, the trustee company exercised its option, and paid the College £5,000 for the shares. In 1958–59 dividends to a total of £162,500 were declared on the shares and received by the College, and in 1959–60 a dividend of £87,500 was paid.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he had divested himself absolutely of all interest in the 100,000 'A' shares, and that he had done so before the dividends were paid. In support of this contention it was argued that the letter of November 14th, 1958, from the appellant to his adviser operated as an equitable assignment of the appellant's beneficial interest in the shares; alternatively that the appellant parted with all interest by procuring the option to be given to the trustee company either beneficially or in its capacity as trustee of the children's settlement of 1949, so that in the latter case a presumption of advancement of the children arose. It was further contended that the grant of the option was an independent voluntary act of the College dealing with its own unencumbered property.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the appellant had not divested himself of all interest in the shares, inasmuch as by section 53 (1) (c) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, he could transfer the beneficial interest only in writing, and the letter of November 14th, 1958, was not addressed to the bank in whose name the shares stood, nor to the College, but to an agent of the appellant. It was also contended that if there had been a transfer of all interest in the shares to the College, the latter then held the shares as a bare trustee for the appellant.

Held (affirming the judgment of Mr Justice Plowman): (1) the option was held by the trustee company on a resulting trust for the appellant, (2) therefore the appellant had not divested himself absolutely of the property in the shares, (3) the sums of £162,500 and £87,500 fell to be treated as the appellant's income for 1958–59 and 1959–60 respectively, (4) section 53 (1) (c) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, was not involved in the case.

Central and District Properties Ltd v. C.I.R.

Stamp duty – Exemption – Transferor and transferee companies – Acquisition of shares – Third party selling shares in transferee company – Whether consideration still 90 per cent of shares in transferee company – Finance Act, 1927, section 55.

The appellant company had an issued capital of 250,000 fully-paid preference shares of £1 each and 1,343,000 fully-paid ordinary stock units. The controlling interest in the company was held by another company (Unicos), which had an issued capital of 646,460 'A' preference shares, 55,653 'B' preference shares, 240,598 'C' preference shares and one million ordinary shares.

The appellant made the following offer to the shareholders in Unicos: for each 'A' preference share one 6½ per cent preference share in the appellant and 9*d* cash; for each 'B' preference share ten 6½ per cent preference shares in the appellant and 4*s* cash; for each 'C' preference share one 6½ per cent preference share in the appellant and no cash; and for each ordinary share, two ordinary shares in the appellant, three 'D' ordinary shares of 4*s* each and 8*s* cash. The total value of the consideration was £5,078,960 of which £4,643,588 was represented by the shares in the appellant, while the balance of £453,372 was in cash. The offer became unconditional. At that stage therefore the consideration was within section 55 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1927, because over 90 per cent of the consideration was in shares of the transferee company.

On the same day a finance company (Leadenhall) offered for sale, by way of negotiable letters of entitlement, £1,433,588 ordinary stock units in the appellant to the preference shareholders in Unicos. Each holder of £1 of preference capital in Unicos was to be entitled to buy one ordinary stock unit in the appellant at the price of 9*s* 9*d*. The negotiable letters of entitlement could be dealt in on the Stock Exchange; and at the relevant time the ordinary stock units in the appellant were quoted at 14*s* to 15*s*, and so the quotation for the letters of entitlement was 4*s* 3*d* selling price and 5*s* 3*d* buying price.

It was contended by the respondent that the 4*s* 3*d* was part of the 'consideration for the acquisition' of the Unicos shares within section 55 (1) (c); and that therefore the provision of the consideration for that acquisition was less than 90 per cent in shares of the appellant.

Held (reversing the judgment of Mr Justice Ungoed-Thomas): the offer by Leadenhall of 1,433,588 ordinary stock units in the appellant to the Unicos shareholders at an undervalue was a part of the consideration for the transfer of their shares; and that therefore the non-permissible proportion of the consideration was more than 10 per cent.

Companies: Charity Covenants

Mr RIDLEY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if a company makes a seven-year covenant to pay a charity £100 a year net, how much the charity actually receives after recovery of tax at existing rates each year; what it costs the company gross per annum; how much the charity will receive after recovery of tax at 8*s* 3*d* in the £ sterling each year after the introduction of a corporation tax at 35 per cent; and what it will cost the company gross.

Mr DIAMOND: At current rates of tax the full amount received by the charity is £163 5*s* 3*d*. The cost to the company is £100, corresponding to earnings before tax of £216 4*s* 4*d* where profits tax is paid at the full rate. With income tax at 8*s* 3*d* the amount received by the charity will be £170 4*s* 3*d*. As to the effect of the corporation tax, I must ask the hon. member to await my right hon. friend's Budget statement.

Investment and Initial Allowances

Mr BARNETT asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what amount of capital expenditure investment and initial allowances have been granted in each of the last ten years; and on what amount of capital expenditure initial allowances only have been granted in each of the last ten years when investment allowances were not available.

Mr CALLAGHAN: The estimated amounts of fixed capital expenditure qualifying for investment allowances and for initial allowances only are as follows:

Expenditure in the year of account ending in the financial year	Qualifying for Investment Allowances	Qualifying for Initial Allowances only

Companies Act

Sir C. OSBORNE asked the President of the Board of Trade, in view of the fact that directors in large companies own only a small proportion of the capital, and tend to become self-perpetuating, if he will introduce legislation to reform the Companies Act and make compulsory the calling for nominations to boards at the end of each year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr JAY: Although the Companies Act needs reform in certain respects, the Jenkins Committee did not recommend this particular change; and I am not convinced that it is the best solution.

Hansard, March 4th, 1965. Oral answers, col. 1511.

Share Transfers: Stamp Duty

Mr GRANT asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost to the Revenue of abolishing stamp duty on share transfers.

Mr MACDERMOT: About £30 million in a full year.

Hansard, March 9th, 1965. Written answers, col. 38.

Non-Residents: Income Tax

Mr BARNETT asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the practice of the Inland Revenue, under section 29 (5) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, with regard to the raising of assessments on income derived by non-residents from money invested in banks and other financial institutions which do not deduct income tax at source.

Mr CALLAGHAN: In some cases this interest is exempted from United Kingdom tax under double taxation agreements between the United Kingdom and other countries. Where this is not the case there would usually be no way of enforcing collection of tax on interest assessed on non-residents and it is not, therefore, the general practice of the Inland Revenue to raise assessments on such interest.

Hansard, March 9th, 1965. Oral answers, col. 228.

Decimal Currency

Mr PATRICK JENKIN asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the decimalization of the currency; and whether he will introduce legislation to implement this reform.

Mr BESSELL asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will now make a statement regarding Her Majesty's Government's policy on the introduction of a decimal coinage system.

Mr CALLAGHAN: I regret that the Government are not yet in a position to make a statement on the possible introduction of a decimal currency.

Mr JENKIN: Would the right hon. Gentleman not agree that this is an inevitable reform and that the sooner it is made the better?

Mr CALLAGHAN: I think that it is a desirable reform, but we have to weigh against it the cost of introduction and the time of the introduction. In addition, there was not complete agreement on the Halsbury Committee about the method which should be employed. Therefore, I think that we would do better to take a little longer to consider all these issues properly before we take any steps.

£ Sterling: Value

Mr DELARGY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much the £ sterling has depreciated in purchasing power since January 1st, 1955.

Mr MACDERMOT: Taking the purchasing power of the £ sterling as 20*s* in January 1955, its value in January 1965 is estimated at approximately 15*s* 4*d*.

OBITUARY

Sir Raymond Needham, Q.C., F.S.A.

Sir Raymond Needham, Q.C., F.S.A., who died last Tuesday, at the age of 87, was very well known in the accountancy profession, and had a long and much valued connection with The Accountant to which at one time he was a frequent contributor. Soon after he started to practise at the bar in 1921 he originated the idea of the Annotated Tax Cases and became the first editor, a position he held for many years. His writings on taxation matters were highly regarded and his wide experience, keen brain and wise judgement made him a valued counsellor.

The many public appointments he held included Private Secretary to the Minister of Information (Lord Beaverbrook) in the First World War, and in the 1939–45 war he again joined his old team, this time at the Ministry of Aircraft Production. He first acted as adviser to the Minister and from 1942–44 he was on the advisory staff of the Ministry and deputy chairman of the Materials Committee.

After the war he became chairman of the English subsidiaries of CIBA, the international chemical company of Basle, and was a moving spirit in the formation in London of the CIBA Foundation for the Promotion of International Co-operation in Medical and Chemical Research, of which he was a trustee from its inception.

His penetrating mind combined with a whole-hearted devotion to his chosen profession made him rapidly successful at the bar. He took Silk after only eight years and thereafter was leader of the Revenue Bar for twelve years. In 1953 he became Treasurer of the Middle Temple and four years later he was knighted for his social and political services.

Sir Raymond's many gifts included great appreciation of all the arts. He was a delightful companion, able to bring a light touch to heavy subjects, and his kindness of heart and public spirit brought him friends wherever he went.

INTER-FIRM COMPARISON SCHEMES IN THE COTTON INDUSTRY

The Cotton Board Productivity Centre is holding a one-day seminar at Fielden House, Mersey Road, West Didsbury, Manchester 20, on March 30th, to provide firms with more information about the Centre's schemes of inter-firm comparison. The schemes have been in operation now for about two years and those firms which are participating have proved them of considerable value as a means of achieving increased efficiency.

Inter-firm comparison schemes enable firms to exercise close financial control over the different aspects of their business and to compare their performance in various fields with that of their competitors. To ensure that performances are compared on an equitable basis companies are allocated to 'activity groups' of companies engaged in similar operations. The results are published in confidence and complete anonymity in the form of a league table showing the ratios of the individual firms and the order of performance. A general report is also circulated which gives an objective commentary and analysis of the most significant aspects of the results.

The seminar is intended for directors and senior executives and much of the time will be devoted to a practical case study of inter-firm comparisons in textiles.

LEGAL DOCUMENTS EXPLAINED TO THE SCOTTISH C.A. APPRENTICE

A useful and instructive work has been published by The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, entitled The Legal Life of David Fraser[1] and written by John Wiseman. Mr Wiseman is a Writer to the Signet and he has subtitled the work 'Aspects of the law in action illustrated for the chartered accountant apprentice'. It deals with the business transactions of a fictitious average client and sets out verbatim the documents he enters into, with, of course, appropriate explanations. As a guide to Scottish law, the book should prove considerably useful to the young apprentice.

Appraisal of Investment Projects by

DISCOUNTED CASH FLOW

PRINCIPLES AND SOME SHORT CUT TECHNIQUES

A. M. ALFRED and J. B. EVANS

In its recent survey entitled Investment Appraisal the National Economic Development Council called for a small book on discounted cash flow; one with 'ready reckoners' that would help the small and medium firm to master and use the technique.

Chapman & Hall believe that this book fills precisely that need. It has been compiled by two of the most experienced industrial practitioners of DCF and is based on papers used by Courtaulds Ltd to spread that technique throughout their accounting staff.

You, the employer, want maximum efficiency seven hours a day from your staff, whether they number 1, or 1,000. So you offer pension and insurance schemes, incentive bonuses, etc. But there's an eighth hour in a working day — 60 minutes of lunch time, which could mean either eating or fasting to your employees. In the interests of recruiting and retaining the right staff, an added incentive has taken its important place beside the normal welfare schemes modern workers expect. Our new book-keeper keeps all our account records in his head!

Clever fellow, our book-keeper. Doesn't keep books at all. Doesn't need to. He relies on his fantastic memory. And the help of a few hundred magnetic cards. He's a computer. The first ever to be installed in a British building society. Fast and infallible, he can store virtually unlimited information, find it again in a fraction of a second and then print statements at a speed equivalent to the output of 200 copy typists. Before long, he'll have streamlined our whole book-keeping system and given us room to accelerate into tomorrow. Put him to work for yourself and let him take care of your investment. There's nothing he'd like better.

THE POST OF THE WEEK

This morning the title of an article in one of our more popular dailies caught my eye. It read: 'It's our EXECUTIVES that I blame'. Since this was only glimpsed across a crowded tube I was unable to read the article in toto. But I had no doubt (later confirmed) that the press was once again astride one of its most overworked hobby-horses. The management structure of any responsible commercial or industrial undertaking is, these days, composed of, and chosen by, for that matter, men of an extremely high calibre of integrity and industriousness.

Professional clients have asked us to find, on behalf of their clients, manufacturers in the metal and light engineering industry, based London EC1, the Chief Accountant. The successful applicant will be a chartered accountant, aged about 30, preferably with managerial accounting experience in engineering. He will initially be required to develop various systems for the group which entails acquiring knowledge of manufacturing operations at various provincial centres. He will be responsible to the Deputy Managing (Finance) Director. A commencing salary of around £2,500 p.a. is envisaged.

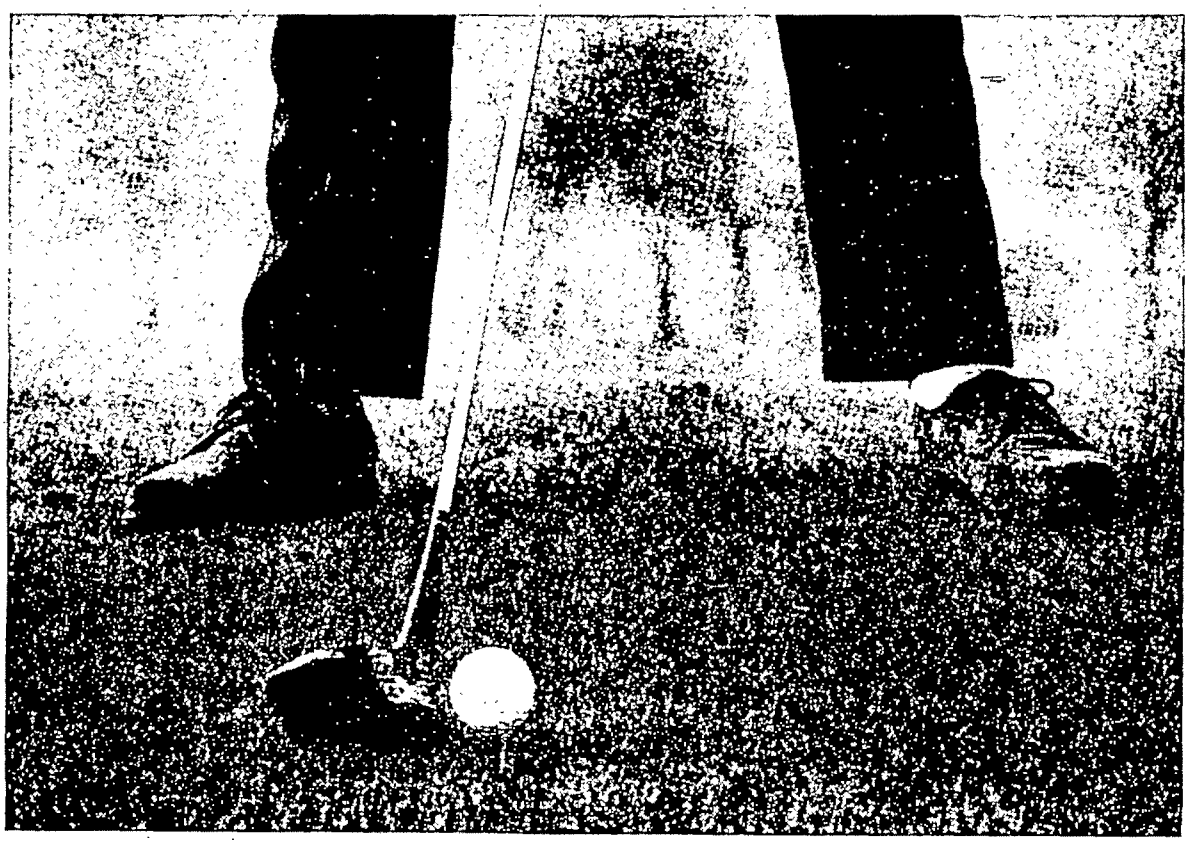
Last Thursday Wendy drew a straight line!

Wendy is eleven years old.

And she is a spastic. At seven, she could not even hold a ball in her hand.

So this is a very considerable achievement.

Wendy is fortunate. Not all the 75,000 spastics in Britain have the same opportunities as her. She went to one of the Spastics Society's schools, where she was taught how to compensate for her disability.



Every year the Society's homes are teaching children like Wendy how to live. But every year many hundreds more spastics do not get the teaching which would rescue them from useless and burdensome lives, simply because the Society is desperately in need of funds. The problem is urgent: every 8 hours another spastic is born.

So when you are asked to advise a client about a legacy, please remember spastics. Your client's legacy could help a spastic towards a normal life.

The Spastics Society welcomes legacies

ENQUIRIES INVITED

SUPERTUTOR!

How a brilliant teacher*explores vital new paths for industry

(*AN I.C.T. 1900 SERIES COMPUTER)

The first of the new I.C.T. 1900 Series computers (announced last year: 150 ordered since) is now actively involved in Britain's future. At the Northampton College, soon to be a new university linked with the City of London, it is hard at work, helping to forge the vital links between Education, Science and Industry on which so much in the next few years depends.

Meeting of trailblazers!

The Northampton College has an international reputation for technological courses—and for its pioneering work with 'sandwich' courses. (About 1,200 students are sponsored by Companies with whom they spend part of their time; and part at the College.)

The I.C.T. 1900 Series computer, also a triumphant trailblazer, will help the new university carry right through with a tremendous expansion of its activities. (A 1900 Series machine fits your needs now, and because of Standard Interface, can be adjusted whenever necessary to go on fitting.)

Trailblazing results

The student population will be allowed to grow in two phases to 5,000. (So many more people in industry can be taught computer techniques.)

Many more projects needing big computer power will be undertaken; i.e. research into subsonic, supersonic and hypersonic flow. And while it is dealing with these the computer—which is a multi-program machine—can at the same time process programs written by students, and programs concerned with the new university's internal accounting and administration.

The way ahead for Britain

If she is to progress, Britain must seize on the latest technology—and apply it in Science, Education, Industry and Commerce.

In all these fields, I.C.T. 1900 Series computers can help. The technological quality of these British machines is high. Their manufacturing quality is proven.

If you are thinking about a computer, I.C.T. will gladly prove to you why a 1900 Series machine is the right computer for your needs, and a sound long-term investment.

According to this publisher, many people do not realize how much they could influence others simply by remembering accurately everything they see, hear or read. Whether in business, at social functions or even in casual conversations with new acquaintances, there are ways in which you can dominate each situation simply by your ability to remember.

Free

These are only a few of the ways in which you will benefit by possessing a trained memory.

To acquaint the readers of The Accountant with the easy-to-follow rules for developing skill in remembering, the publishers have printed full details of their interesting self-training method in a twenty-six page book, Adventures in Memory, which will be sent free to anyone who requests it. Lessons for Planners

THE failure of the National Economic Development Council's much publicized plan for growth was due to the impossibility of achieving the balance of payments position upon which the entire expansionist policy was based. The inability to expand exports sufficiently was due partly to the fact that British costs and prices tended to rise more rapidly than those of overseas competitors. But this was not the only reason. Professor AUSTIN ROBINSON has argued in The London and Cambridge Economic Bulletin that a failure to design products in accordance with foreign requirements and an inability to adapt products to the rapidly changing tastes of overseas buyers also contributed to the balance of payments difficulties.

Nevertheless, the lack of an effective incomes policy has been the paramount reason for Britain's inability to sustain a continuous rate of economic growth without running into inflation and balance of payments difficulties. The most disquieting aspect of Neddy's failure is put forward by Mr G. R. DENTON, the author of a new broadsheet from Political and Economic Planning.[1] He points out that when the N.E.D.C. plans were adopted for publication, 'there was no agreement even on what sort of an incomes policy we should attempt, no prospect of getting agreement on setting up the required institutions and machinery . . .'. If the present attempt, under the guidance of Mr GEORGE BROWN, to plan the British economy is not to end in a similar disaster, then both a plan and machinery for an incomes policy is necessary.

This, then, is the simple explanation of Mr BROWN's urgent efforts to persuade industry and the trade unions to ratify the declaration of intent and now, with the appointment of Mr AUBREY JONES, M.P., to the chairmanship of the new Prices and Incomes Review Board, the stage is set for the MINISTER's explanation of how this body is to function. Mr DENTON comments that there is 'no evidence from other countries that have had such institutional arrangements for some years that they had succeeded in keeping down the rise in money incomes'. What reasons, therefore, are there for assuming that Mr BROWN will prove so much more successful? The author himself is somewhat sceptical. 'In the absence of evidence that Mr BROWN has succeeded in doing anything more than putting employers and trade union leaders into a position where they could not afford to say "no" ', observed Mr DENTON, 'the difficulties in the way of an incomes policy appear, as they always have, insuperable'. On the other hand, the author is anxious to judge Mr GEORGE BROWN's efforts fairly and he notes that the primary object of the exercise may be met by effecting some temporary restraint on wage increases, together with some control of price increases, which may strengthen international confidence and the balance of payments position about the time when the import surcharge is removed.

Until it can be seen, however, that the new incomes policy is having some effect on the balance of payments, there is little point in reviving discussion of the appropriate rate of growth for the British economy. Mr BROWN's recent assertion that the gross national product is to be increased by 25 per cent between 1964 and 1970 merely enables him to avoid telling his supporters that the N.E.D.C. projection of a 4 per cent annual increase is now forgotten. On the other hand, as the P.E.P. broadsheet points out, by specifying a global figure over the longer period, the Government has ensured a greater degree of flexibility in putting its plan into effect.

By itself, however, an incomes policy is not likely to galvanize the British economy into a resurgence of activity. It can only form part of a much more broadly based policy which must include measures to counter regional disparities, an inadequate rate of industrial investment, and the elimination of monopolistic and restrictive practices, among other constraints upon growth. In particular, Mr DENTON argues that a more radical approach to tax reform is urgently needed, just as the expansion in public expenditure needs to be regulated in accordance with the state of the economy. In the past there has been a tendency to cling to optimistic assumptions about the rate of economic growth, while contriving to pursue expensive welfare policies. The Richardson Committee's rejection of the added value tax is criticized on the grounds that the tax was judged merely as a substitute for two minor taxes, i.e. the purchase tax and profits tax. On this basis the case for the adoption of T.V.A. is undoubtedly limited. Seen, however, as the basis of 'a shift in the whole burden of taxation to a reliance on value added taxes', apart from the possibility of remitting such a tax as an incentive to exports, then the case for the T.V.A. seems rather different.

However effective central economic planning may be, in an economy which depends in the main upon private enterprise, the future living standards of the nation depend on the efficiency with which firms utilize their resources. Another P.E.P. study of attitudes in industrial management throws some light on the widely differing attitudes of management to their tasks.[1] An earlier study from P.E.P. suggested that the chief impediment to a faster rate of economic growth is that we do not want it enough. Certainly there seems some evidence of this attitude of mind among the managements of the forty-seven medium-sized firms in a number of industries which were investigated.

'Indifference to modern practices for improving productivity and efficiency is widespread within certain strata of British industry.' Admittedly, this is truer of the many smaller firms than of the small number of industrial giants. These too have their problems, but they are not of this sort. The main defects uncovered in the survey related to the weakness of middle management, the slow adoption of modern management techniques, and the reluctance to utilize the services of management consultants. Of labour relations, the report concludes that 'in the long run management gets the shop stewards it deserves' but concedes that 'there are usually considerable faults on both sides'. Full employment has forced management to adopt acceptable procedures to deal with wage grievances, but the attitude to apprenticeship varied widely from firm to firm, and few of them devoted much effort to training foremen upon whom so much rests. More and more funds are being devoted to research and development, but the effort was all too often misdirected or inadequate, not least because of unsatisfactory relations between the R. and D. staff and the marketing personnel. Few of the firms investigated undertook market research.

It is all to the good that attention should be drawn to the state of affairs limiting the rate of economic growth. Publicity will discourage the worst practices and encourage discussion of the means to reform. In the last resort, however, it is the individual's attitude of mind towards his job which determines whether he is a 'thruster' or 'sleeper'. Mr BROWN must ensure that his Ministry creates the environment in which the incentives to the 'thruster' far outweigh the inducements to the 'sleeper'. For a start he could remind Mr CALLAGHAN and his colleagues that the carrot is often more effective than the stick.

Stamp Duty Device Succeeds

FINALITY in stamp duty disputes with the Inland Revenue is not achieved either lightly or quickly. The House of Lords last week pronounced finally on the duty payable on eighty-nine share transfers which were executed as long ago as November 1st, 1957, over seven years ago. At the same time they have established the efficacy of a simple means of avoiding the ad valorem 'conveyance on sale' duty. The recipe for the purchaser is to acquire a mere option and to take a transfer or conveyance from the potential vendor in order to protect the purchaser's option. The property is then legally vested in the purchaser. Thereafter the agreement for sale is made. Since the property has already been conveyed, no further conveyance is needed. Nevertheless, the original conveyance was not 'on sale' because at the date it was executed there was no sale.

The case arose out of the acquisition by William Cory & Son Ltd of the share capitals of six companies. One of the management directors of Cory and a representative of the vendors came to an oral agreement in August 1957 for the sale at £450,000, but subject to contract and other matters. After various investigations into title Cory's solicitors produced a draft agreement which merely gave Cory an option to purchase the shares at the stipulated price. An option agreement in substantially the same terms was executed, along with share transfers, on November 1st, 1957. The Inland Revenue claimed ad valorem duty on the consideration money on alternative grounds. They said that either the transfers were themselves conveyances 'on sale', or the agreement was an agreement for sale of an equitable interest in the shares, within the meaning of section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891. When the Stamp Office claim duty on two alternative arguments, one can be sure that they are somewhat unsure about the chargeability of either document.

It was not until August 1963 that the Inland Revenue stated the case which Cory had demanded in order to appeal to the High Court against the Inland Revenue decision. There Mr Justice PENNYCUICK held that the option agreement was not an agreement for sale and the transfers were not transfers 'on sale' and accordingly that no ad valorem duty was payable. As might be expected, the Inland Revenue appealed to the Court of Appeal where they had more success. Lord DENNING and Lord Justice DANCKWERTS held that the transfers were transfers on sale and stampable as such, while Lord Justice DIPLOCK agreed with Mr Justice PENNYCUICK (43 A.T.C. 215). One observation of Lord DENNING was, if we may say so with respect, somewhat startling. He said he did not accept the proposition that the liability of an instrument depends on the circumstances which exist when the instrument comes into existence. This proposition is surely a fundamental principle of stamp duty law.

However, the House of Lords have now unanimously overruled him and have restored the judgment of Mr Justice PENNYCUICK.

Lord REID said that the Crown's argument avoided any reliance on anything which happened after the transfers had been executed. But this, he said, forced the Crown into the position of admitting that even if Cory had not exercised the option and the shares had been transferred back to the vendors, nevertheless the transfers to Cory remained transfers on sale and stampable as such. As Lord REID said, that was a completely novel argument. Another argument advanced by the Crown was the opposite of novel. It was the age-old argument that if the appeal was allowed the door would be open to wholesale avoidance. To this, of course, the answer was that the words of a taxing Act are never stretched against the taxpayer. There was a very good reason for that rule. So long as one adhered to the natural meaning of the charging words, the law was as certain as it was possible to make it. But if the Courts were to give the charging words what might be called a liberal construction who could say just how far that would go? Avoidance could be met by amending legislation.

It is interesting to observe that the Inland Revenue's alternative argument that the option agreement was an agreement for the sale of an equitable interest met with no approval anywhere in the Courts.

The House of Lords settled finally the question whether the Inland Revenue can be made to pay interest on stamp duty which they have wrongfully exacted. There is no power to pay such interest. However, Lord REID said that if amending legislation was to be introduced, it could well provide for interest.

Cost Accountants on the New Taxes

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER'S invitation to representative bodies to comment on his proposed two new taxes has called forth comments which may well considerably modify the proposals. An extremely cogent and forthright memorandum has now been published by The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants. In particular it has pointed out that the National Economic Development Council, in its booklet Investment Appraisal, counsels the use of discounted cash flow techniques in appraising the worth of any investment, and insists that tax charges must be brought into account in estimating future cash flows. Against this is the fact that the CHANCELLOR has intimated that he will not announce the rate of the new corporation tax until he presents his Budget in April 1966. In these circumstances, a scientific assessment of tax charges is impossible. As the Institute points out, it is regrettable that the good advice of a Government-sponsored organization should be made ineffectual by the present uncertainty as to the rate of tax. There is no real answer to the question why the rate is not to be announced in the forthcoming Budget.

The I.C.W.A. says that it is clear that the corporation tax will be at a rate lower than most overseas tax rates. It comments on the CHANCELLOR'S announcement that nevertheless the amount of double tax relief allowed to a company will not exceed its corporation tax. In the Institute's view this will put the affected companies at a disadvantage as compared with companies whose income comes entirely from the United Kingdom. There is a somewhat similar argument in relation to capital allowances. If these are confined to a low rate of corporation tax, their cash value will be less than expected. In relation to capital assets already acquired or contracted for, the I.C.W.A. regards this as a breach of faith, which indeed it is. As far as these assets are concerned, the Institute thinks that the allowance should be stepped up to be of the same cash value.

The Institute also criticizes the practice of confining capital allowances to the historic cost, despite subsequent rises in prices of such assets. It argues that notwithstanding the fall in the value of money the allowance should stay the same in real economic terms, and not merely in terms of a depreciated currency. There is no doubt, as the Institute points out, that heavily capitalized industries are at a disadvantage in this respect compared with other companies. Again, the Institute thinks that capital allowances should be broadened to cover other business assets: offices, showrooms and the like. There could be specially high rates of investment allowance for assets of particular economic significance, while revenue expenditure on scientific research should not be excluded from investment allowances as well as being deductible. There is an interesting suggestion that one way of encouraging exports without infringing international agreements may be to defer collection of tax on profits arising from exports.

One of the Government's apologies for the new tax system is that it will be simpler and more rational. The I.C.W.A. puts in a plea for some rationalization in relation to groups of companies; in particular the removal of tax obstacles to reconstructions and amalgamations. The Institute recognizes that some such reconstructions may bring tax avoidance but suggests that the hindrances be removed wherever it can be demonstrated to the Revenue that no abuse or avoidance will result from a particular scheme.

As others have done, the Institute points out that whether a company is financed by debentures (or loans) or by preference shares is often a historical accident. Nevertheless the CHANCELLOR has intimated that in computing profit for the new corporation tax a deduction will be allowed for debenture or loan interest but not for preference dividends. This certainly is in itself an anomaly, which comes strangely from an Administration pledged to remove old anomalies. There does not seem to us to be any real objection to the Institute's suggestion that preference dividends be deductible. The company can, of course, deduct and account for income tax at the standard rate on such dividends. Nor can the Government fairly insist on charging corporation tax on dividends which themselves have been paid out of profits charged to the same tax.

On capital gains tax the I.C.W.A. is equally forthright and argues in particular against taxing apparent gains which are thrown up merely by a depreciation in the currency.

We reproduce the memorandum in full elsewhere in this issue.

Less Room at the Top?

OUR young contemporary Contra, the journal of The Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London, has been busy identifying the 'top twenty' firms of accountants in the British Isles on the basis of the number of appointments they hold as auditors of quoted public companies. After analysing upwards of five thousand entries in The Stock Exchange Official Year Book, the resulting table (published in the March issue of Contra) shows that three firms – Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co (with 329), Price Waterhouse & Co (274) and Deloitte, Plender, Griffiths & Co (240) – are, by this means of measurement, numerically in a class by themselves. Only two other firms – Cooper Brothers & Co (127) and Thomson McLintock & Co (100) – run into three figures. Between them these five firms audit the accounts of 1,070 or about 20 per cent of all quoted companies. The ninety-nine other firms listed share 1,839 audits in portions which range from seventy-eight down to eight. This still leaves something over 2,000 audit assignments for the small firms who did not achieve a Contra rating.

The compiler of the statistics admits that there are obvious objections to grading by the simple method of counting mentions in a directory, one being that quoted public companies differ considerably in size and another being that the proportion of auditing in accounting practices may, and indeed does, vary greatly. Another objection, not mentioned, is that with so many firms now working 'in association with' others in one form or another, true comparisons tend to become obscured. If the table were amended to take these arrangements into account, one or more of these 'consortiums' would exceed the hundred audit mark and might even cause some dislocation among the placings of the present so-called 'big five'.

The exercise carried out by Contra can, at this stage, be little more than an ingenious divertissement. If, however, it is repeated in, say, five years, when the new Companies Act is (we hope) in being and a proper alignment of firms has taken place, the results should provide useful material for a social commentary on the structure of the profession. Our own forecast is that there would be many fewer than 104 firms with eight or more mentions, that many of the smaller firms would have disappeared altogether as separate entities and that there would be a greater concentration of firms at or near the top. This would be completely consistent with the power philosophy which nowadays dominates every form of human endeavour from politics to professional football.

An Appraisal of Investment Appraisal

by G. L. E. SPIER, M.A.

ATTENTION has been so riveted – or distracted – by the account given of the discounted cash flow (D.C.F.) technique in the recent National Economic Development Council publication, Investment Appraisal, that many readers have missed the other important and less readily concedable propositions it contains. These are, basically, that investment should be evaluated on a post-taxation basis; that a reasonable return on capital investment is 7 per cent; that it is preferable to invest in machinery rather than stock or buildings; and that returns should be calculated over a long period, say, seventeen years. The last has already been criticized in a leading article in these columns as 'crystal gazing', and will be dealt with only in so far as it is of interest in the other propositions. For the rest, it will be instructive to note that the best arguments against these points are given in the N.E.D.C. report itself, mainly in its Table 2, which is reproduced on the facing page.

Two Applications

The report starts off by explaining that the post-taxation evaluation can only be used when a firm is earning substantial profits outside the new venture, so that full tax rebates can be obtained. The technique has, however, two possible applications – to one isolated small additional investment, in which case it would be of little importance; or continuously up to and after the time when all plant shall have been replaced. In the latter case each investment must bring in sufficient profits for the subsequent investment to benefit from the rebates. This is just what the example given in Table 2 fails to do. In fact, the total tax paid over the seventeen-year period is $-£28$; and on a period of less than thirteen years (long enough in all conscience) the position is still worse. This means that the investment throughout its life is dependent on other activities of the firm to earn its tax rebates; or that it is one of the less profitable ventures of the particular firm, on no account to be repeated. In any case it will never contribute towards the earning of the tax rebates for other schemes.

Table 2 therefore shows that unless the return is over 8 per cent, the post-taxation method is completely inadmissible. Even at this figure, however, it is questionable because of the massive rebates which must be earned early in the life of the equipment. One would conclude that a post-taxation analysis which showed less than 10 per cent return should, from the practical point of view, be treated with the gravest suspicion. Furthermore, only the first five years are really significant since it would, on the basis of the N.E.D.C. table, require ten machines in their seventh year – when the tax paid is greatest – to earn the rebate for one machine in its first year. Here the implications should be noted not only by those who formulate the taxes but also by those who encourage expansion.

The only alternative interpretations are that the firm is earning better profits outside its manufacturing activities (which is surely not the assumption of the report), or that the firm's sales and manufacturing functions are costed separately and that the returns on the former cover the rebate requirements of the latter. This is either advanced or unorthodox thinking, and should have been stated expressly if it was intended.

It now becomes obvious from the N.E.D.C. example that the tax structure is itself designed for returns of at least 10 per cent, which makes one wonder why the N.E.D.C. should encourage the acceptance of a so much lower rate. If 7 per cent is desirable, then it is the rebate scheme which requires reappraisal.

Bad Costing

The calculation of a 7 per cent return is moreover based on the assumption that money itself costs nothing – the funds used being, perhaps, profits ploughed back. This surely is bad costing. If the use of money in an industrial enterprise with all its risks – not to speak of the hard work involved – shows no greater return than in the discounting of Treasury bills, it cannot be considered well invested. The 15 per cent return, about which the N.E.D.C. is so scathing, is no

(c) Income tax saved, 41¼ per cent of allowances; profits tax saved, 15 per cent of allowances. However, the phasing year-by-year varies so that the figures in column D are not simply 56¼ per cent of those in column C. The figure of 293 in column D for year 1 is made up as follows:

	Income tax saved 41¼ per cent	Profits tax saved 15 per cent
300 investment allowance	123·75	45·00
100 initial allowance	41·25	—
200 annual allowance	82·50	—
Total	247·50	45·00

In year 2, the income tax saved is 57·75 on the 140 annual allowance for that year; profits tax of 45 is saved on the 300 initial and annual allowances of year 1, making 102·75 (say 103) in total. In year 3, income tax is saved on the 112 annual allowance for that year and profits tax on the 140 annual allowance of year 2, and so on.

(d) A minus sign denotes a tax rebate, realizable immediately provided that profits on other operations incur a tax liability at least equal to these amounts.

(e) i.e. 4·3 per cent is the rate of discount which equates the stream of earnings shown in this column to a total value of £1,000.

more than the theoretical minimum 8 per cent established above, plus the Bank rate which one was taught at school was the pure cost of money.

It is nice to think of company directors treating their shareholders' money with the same respect as if it were on loan. It is disturbing to find that the Government's advisers may have less respect for that contributed by the taxpayer.

The final point – the preferability of machinery over stocks and buildings – takes theory to a ridiculous extreme. In the first place one assumes that the tax rebates on machinery are, at least partly, recognition of the fact that it is a wasting asset, not an attempt to direct investment. In the second place both stocks and, to an extent, buildings are largely determined by the manufacturing process employed. A bigger, faster machine may dictate bigger raw material stocks, a larger factory and a stronger sales-force. The N.E.D.C. has failed to distinguish between investment for expansion and investment for greater machine intensivity. It is to be hoped that no ordinary accountant or director would make the same mistake.

The Accountant and Quantitative Reporting

by J. C. LANDON, F.C.A.

ACCOUNTING reports on the day-to-day operations of business are usually expressed in monetary terms. Among those familiar with the conception of business activities in terms of money this type of report makes a valuable contribution to business operations, be it in the simple form of cost summaries or wage analyses, or be it in the more sophisticated form of budgets. Yet many business men, and especially junior technical managers, are suspicious of financial reports because they do not fully understand them. This is often because the monetary amounts involved are outside their personal experience and therefore have little or no meaning for them. This should therefore be taken into account when considering an effective management accounting service to all levels of management.

Control Data

There is no need for accounting reports always to be in monetary terms. Admittedly, accounting records provide information more readily in this form; yet one of the objectives of management accounting is to provide data for the control of business, and to achieve this it must be able to express events in terms that are understandable to all management. For if control data can be used close to the points of activity, then there is less likelihood of adverse trends in events reaching significant proportions before their effects are fully realized.

Records of labour times, weight and units of production are available to varying extents in all businesses. However, the significance of these records is often overlooked, for records in terms of quantity can often have a greater bearing on the control of particular facets of the business than broader reports in monetary values. For example, output reported in terms of sales values may cloak a fall in productive labour hours because of an increase in the value of the material content of the products. Records of quantitative data, originally recorded for wage payment, invoicing customers or similar day-to-day activities, are a fruitful source for the basic information on which to build quantitative reports which will enable control of activities to be effected near their source.

Selection of Quantitative Units

In considering how such information can usefully be incorporated in a management control system, the selection of the quantitative unit is the main factor. Often two differing quantitative units should be covered to make the report effective (e.g. units produced in a stated number of machine running hours). Selection will usually be a matter of compromise as, for example, the practical difficulties in reporting regularly in some quantitative forms may be uneconomic. A period of experiment using different quantitative measurements may be necessary to establish the most suitable unit and to create empirical formulae for the relationship between different quantitative forms.

In some cases, the significant basic data may not be already available, but by introducing a simple recording system considerable benefits can often be derived from the regular reporting of this data in summarized form. For example, the recording of machine running hours is not as prevalent in many industries as it should be, although successfully to operate expensive machinery this information is of vital importance, as is a knowledge of the contribution made to machine down time by different causes. In general, the criteria for establishing the degree of accuracy required, frequency of reporting, and detail of analyses are the same as those for financial reporting.

Contribution to Overall Results

Quantitative reports not only assist junior management to control the operations for which they are responsible but also provide useful assessments of their performance for consideration by higher management. The good and bad points of an operation are known to all connected with the activity but the degree to which they contribute to the overall results is often not nearly so clearly understood. For instance, the effects of factors outside the control of the manager immediately responsible for an operation will be given different emphasis depending on the standpoint of persons reporting on it; precise data of actual quantitative losses, because of these factors, is much more telling. Senior management can then discern the sources of inefficiency more fairly and make more just appraisals of performance. These lead to more effective control and profitable operation of the business.

Quantitative reports become fully effective when used in conjunction with predetermined levels for required activity (e.g. acceptable machine down time, normal wastage, etc.). In practice, such levels cannot be established until the reports have been in operation for a sufficient period to give an indication of the results being achieved. When these data are available it is possible to consider the use of yardsticks or standards. These should not be based entirely on past performance but must be related to it. They should be assessed in the light of technical information available and with the co-operation of the persons who will use the reports. If those concerned fully understand how the yardsticks have been determined, they will more readily accept reports showing adverse results and work to improve the position.

Unprofitable Factors

Some examples of the types of quantitative reports under discussion are periodic summaries of productive and non-productive labour hours; machine running hours and down time; tonnages of good and bad material produced in a period. The unprofitable factors, such as non-productive labour and machine down time, can usefully be analysed under the main sources from which they arose. When predetermined levels are set for these factors, a regular comparison with actual results will highlight adverse trends and indicate weaknesses in the operation which need attention.

The figures will also clearly show when the demands on facilities are becoming excessive, and in this connection it is often useful to include data on overtime working and to segregate operations of different shifts. Where bonus earnings are related to time or weight, a measure of the effectiveness of the operators can be included by comparison of the time or weight allowed with actual production times or weights. The degree of sophistication in this reporting is a matter for specific study in each case; but once junior management find the use that can be made of such reports there is a tendency for them to require some over-elaboration of the figures. Some measure of indulgence in this respect sustains their interest but the degree to which this is carried must be weighed against costs of preparation.

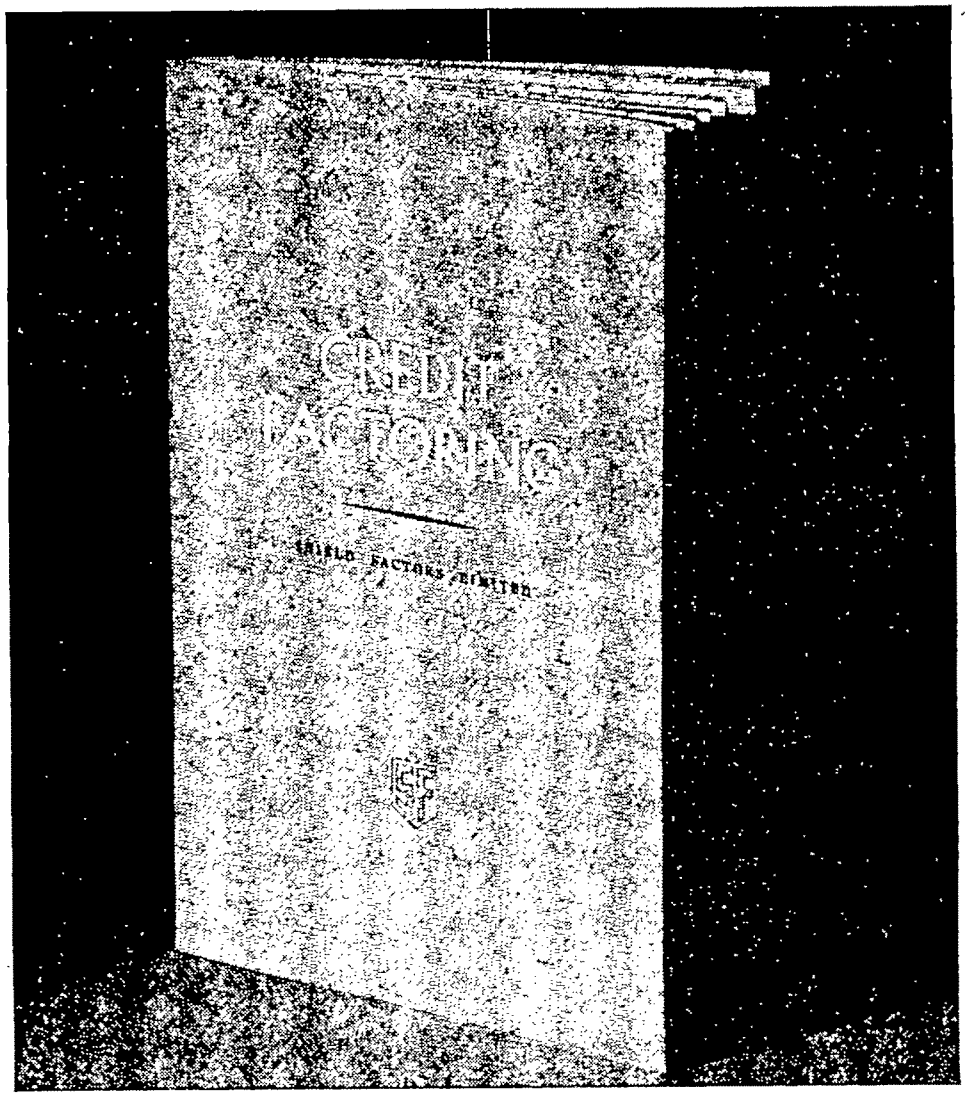
An established system of quantitative reporting provides information on many aspects of a business which may not have been fully apparent from the financial figures. It gives rise to a source of data for the better appraisal of future requirements and the effect on the business of likely changes in volume of sales. Also a full appreciation of quantitative reports by junior management can form a good basis for educating them to understand financial reports on the operations for which they are responsible.

From this outline it is hoped the reader will be able to assess the possibilities of the application of quantitative reports in his own field, and will be rewarded by the increased benefits his accountancy experience can bring in helping to extend the appreciation of figures by those in the different levels of management and their use in controlling activities.

Accounting Practice Vindicated

by K. BUCKLEY EDWARDS

This article examines a number of important decisions regarding loss relief in the case of a finance company, with particular reference to three recent decisions of the House of Lords.



THERE has been before the Courts in recent years a number of cases concerning loss relief under section 341 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, which, if read independently at different times must, it is thought, leave a somewhat confused picture in the reader's mind. In two of the cases before the Lords a question as to the correct method of accounting for income tax purposes, where investment income is involved, was discussed and a final decision reached, subject to any possible amending legislation. It is the purpose of this article to set out the basic principles which emerge from these several decisions.

Commercial Transactions

It will be convenient to start with the case of Griffiths v. J. P. Harrison (Watford) Ltd (41 A.T.C. 36; 40 T.C. 281) which was the first dividend-stripping case to be considered by the House of Lords. The taxpayer company carried on business as merchants until 1953–54 when that business ceased. For 1952–53 the company made a loss of £13,585 which could be carried forward to 1953–54 for the purpose of loss relief under section 341. In October 1953, the company's memorandum of association was altered to enable the company to carry on business as a dealer in stocks and shares. In the exercise of these new powers the company, in December 1953, bought all the issued share capital of C. Ltd for £16,900 and borrowed £15,900 for that purpose. C. Ltd had ceased business as merchants in the previous month but had accumulated profits available for dividend. In January 1954, C. Ltd paid the taxpayer company a dividend of £28,912 less tax of £13,011, leaving £15,901 net, out of which the company repaid the £15,900 it had borrowed. This was the only share-dealing transaction in 1953–54 and thereafter the company sold its shares in C. Ltd for £1,000. The company thus had a trading loss of £13,585 and a loss of £15,900 on share-dealing, making a total loss of £29,485; but it had received a net dividend of £15,901 and had a tax claim of £13,011, making a total of £28,912. The Revenue resisted the tax claim, mainly on the ground that the object of a trading transaction was to make a profit and not to obtain a dividend against which it could claim to set off its losses.

In the House of Lords, Viscount Simonds said the proposition that trade was carried on with a view to profit was not universally true, and was not to be tested merely by ascertaining the difference between the purchase price or manufacturing cost of an article and its selling price. A dealer might seek his profit otherwise than by an enhanced price on resale, as by a declaration of dividend, a repayment on a reduction of capital or on a liquidation of the company whose shares he had bought. So long as the transaction was not a sham, as in Johnson v. Jewitt (40 A.T.C. 314), it was wholly immaterial what might be the fiscal result or the ulterior fiscal object of the transaction. Therefore, the loss sustained in the dividend-stripping operation was available for relief under section 341.

In the above case the transaction was carried out before the enactment of section 4 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1955, whereby, stated broadly, a net dividend received in such circumstances is to be treated as an untaxed trading receipt; but the company in question had trade losses independent of the loss realized on the purchase and sale of the shares in C. Ltd. Suppose, however, there had been no independent trading loss. The proper method of making up the company's accounts for the purpose of assessment under Case I of Schedule D would then have assumed considerable importance. There would have been a loss of £15,900 on the dividend-stripping, a net dividend of £15,901 and a tax deduction of £13,011. Clearly, if the correct method were to bring the gross dividend (or even the net dividend) into the computation, there would be no loss and no claim under section 341. On the other hand, if the dividend had to be omitted from the account, the loss of £15,900 would qualify for tax relief, as in fact it did, so that in the case there was no question of including the dividend in the tax computation.

Capital Dividend

There is not in the Act of 1952 or elsewhere, any express general exemption of dividends from taxation in the hands of the recipients. But a series of cases in the House of Lords, of which Bradbury v. English Sewing Cotton Co Ltd (8 T.C. 481) and Neumann v. C.I.R. (18 T.C. 332; 13 A.T.C. 1) are perhaps the most important, show that no dividend (from which tax has been deducted at source) received by a person who is not a trader can be taxed in his hands, and that a capital profits dividend is not liable to income tax or surtax in the hands of the recipient. In the latter case Lord Wright said:

> 'Profits once having been taxed in the company's hands, do not bear further tax (apart from surtax) in the shareholders' hands. There is in fact only one profit, no new profit being created from the fact that the shareholder gets his share: the tax is a tax on the profits and not on the dividend.'

In Cenlon Finance Co Ltd v. Ellwood (41 A.T.C. 11) the House considered the case of a capital profits dividend paid to a finance company, while two of the Lords expressed novel views on the proper treatment of a dividend from which tax had been deducted at source in the accounts of a trading company assessable to tax under Case I of Schedule D.

The facts in the Cenlon case were that the taxpayer company, a dealer in stocks and shares, had received from a wholly-owned subsidiary of ladies' outfitters in November 1953, a capital dividend of £25,000 which had been paid out of profits arising from the sale of some freehold property. The Inspector of Taxes agreed a computation of the taxpayer company's profits for income tax purposes which excluded the dividend from the computation, but a new Inspector raised an additional assessment for 1955–56 and an assessment for 1956–57 which included the dividend in the company's assessable profits.

The House held that as the taxpayer was a dealer in stocks and shares and so a trading company, any sum coming to it from its trading assets must enter into the computation of its profits for income tax purposes unless either (i) that sum was separately assessable under some other schedule (e.g. Schedule C), or (ii) was excluded from taxation by statute or by judicial interpretation of a statute, as in Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (21 T.C. 472) where, in respect of certain securities, specific and express exemption from tax was provided. As neither of these exceptions applied in the case, the dividend of £25,000 had to be brought into the computation of the taxpayer's profits for income tax purposes. So far, therefore, a capital dividend has to be brought into the computation of a share dealer's profits, but a dividend from which tax has already been deducted at source does not.

Lord Denning said that had Cenlon not been a dealer in stocks and shares, it would not have been chargeable with tax on the capital dividend by reason of a positive rule of law that dividends as such are not liable to tax. But Lord Reid's remarks seem to suggest that a capital dividend coming to any company from its trading assets (circulating capital) must enter into the computation of its profits for income tax purposes unless somehow exempted.

Obiter Dicta

In the Cenlon case Viscount Simonds went on to say this:

> 'I would affirm what was said by Donovan, L.J. (than whom no one has a wider knowledge of revenue law), about the treatment by a trading company of dividends from which tax has been deducted at the source. There is no doubt that the practice is and, so far as I know, always has been to include such dividends in the computation of profits taxable under Case I of Schedule D and to make an allowance or adjustment for the tax that has been paid. I agree with the learned Lord Justice in thinking that there is no specific provision of any statute which prescribes such an adjustment. It can only arise out of the recognition by the Crown that it is necessary in order to avoid double taxation of the same subject-matter. It is in any case no justification for exempting from taxation a dividend paid out of profits which have not borne tax.'

The remarks of Donovan, L.J., above referred to, were very much to the same effect and were made by the Lord Justice when the Cenlon case was before the Court of Appeal (40 A.T.C. 99). They read:

> 'These appeals do not raise the problem of the proper treatment of dividends taxed at source received by a company dealing in stocks and shares by way of trade, but in the course of the argument the question has naturally been looked at. These also, in my view, would fall to be included in a computation of profits taxable under Case I of Schedule D, with an adjustment of the tax bill which allows for that suffered at source. There may be no specific provision for such an adjustment. . . . But such an adjustment must obviously be made to do justice, and to give effect to the oft-recognized prohibition in the Income Tax Acts against such a double levy of tax, even though it may not be double taxation in the strictly theoretical sense.'

Lord Denning, in the House of Lords, did not say, in terms, that a dividend from which tax has been deducted at source must be brought into the computation of a stock and share dealer's profits, but such a view seems to be implicit in his remarks. He said:

'I would agree . . . that if a share dealer receives a dividend which has been taxed at source, that is to say, if it is paid out of a fund which has already been brought into charge for tax, he should not be taxed again on it. The tax bill against him should be adjusted, as Donovan, L.J., said, on equitable grounds, so as to allow for the tax suffered at source, even though there is nothing in the statute about it.'

These obiter dicta were not really necessary to a decision in the Cenlon case, since the point at issue in that case concerned only a capital dividend; but the dicta played a part in the decision of the Court of Appeal in C.I.R. v. F.S. Securities Ltd (42 A.T.C. 264) and changed for a time the practice of the Revenue. The reason why this change of practice did not continue was that the House of Lords later reversed the Court of Appeal's decision.

Investment Income

In F.S. Securities the taxpayer, a dealer in stocks and shares, purchased the entire share capital of three other companies with undistributed profits for a total sum of £1,317,565. These three companies paid to the taxpayer company dividends of £1,686,198 gross and £927,408 net, after which the value of the three companies' shares fell to an estimated £424,114. The taxpayer company did not bring the dividends it had received into its computation for tax purposes, and it obtained from the Revenue a tax refund of £404,020 against the loss of £893,451, plus a small loss on other stocks and shares. The Revenue made a surtax direction against the taxpayer on the footing that it was an investment company within section 257 (2) of the 1952 Act.

In the Court of Appeal, Donovan, L.J., again said it must be taken to be the case in law, whatever the practice, that dividends taxed at source should, if they were receipts of the taxpayer's trade of dealing in stocks and shares, be entered in the computation of the profits of that trade, and he entertained no doubt that the dividends in question were part of the company's trading receipts. On that footing the Court held that the company was not an investment company, because the dividends it received should be treated as trading income, with the consequence that that income was earned income within section 525 (1) of the 1952 Act and not investment income.

The effect of this decision on accounting practice was stated by Plowman, J., in Argosam Finance Co Ltd v. Oxby and C.I.R. (43 A.T.C. 26) at first instance. He said that until July 1963, the practice of the Revenue in assessing to tax under Schedule D the profits of a company, the business of which was to trade in stocks and shares, was to leave out of account dividends which had already suffered tax by deduction, but that following the decision of the Court of Appeal in F.S. Securities the Revenue had reversed its former practice.

Accordingly, in the Argosam case the Revenue contended that taxed dividends should be included at their gross amount in computing the company's profits and losses for the purpose of section 341. This case, however, does not advance the matters under discussion, since the company applied to the Court by originating summons for a ruling as to how to make up its accounts, and the Court said the company must resort to the appeal Commissioners in the usual way and, if necessary, appeal to the High Court by case stated. It said it had no jurisdiction on originating summons to determine a hypothetical question of that kind. This decision was later reaffirmed by the Court of Appeal but on the slightly different ground that the summons was an abuse of the process of the Court.

House of Lords' Decision

Before the Court of Appeal hearing in the Argosan case came the decision of the House of Lords in F.S. Securities (43 A.T.C. 156) which unanimously reversed the Court of Appeal. It said that under the scheme of the income tax code the dividends received by the taxpayer company ought to be excluded from the computation of the company's profits or losses for the purpose of Case I of Schedule D, and that therefore the dividends were not earned income within section 525 (1) of the 1952 Act. Nevertheless, the dividends were income of the company and must therefore be investment income within section 257 (2) so that the surtax direction was rightly made.

Counsel for the Crown assured the House that their researches contradicted the existence of the practice referred to by Viscount Simonds and counsel for the taxpayer also confirmed the novelty of the assumption made by Cenlon. But Lord Reid said that at one time there was a somewhat similar practice with regard to claims based on losses. This is thought to refer to the position which obtained before the enactment of section 13 of the Finance Act, 1937, now section 341 (3) of the 1952 Act, which provides that, for the purposes of the section, a loss sustained in a trade is to be computed in the same way as profits or gains. Before 1937, in calculating the profits of a dealer in stocks and shares, dividends were always omitted because they had already suffered tax at source, but in calculating losses, dividends were included in the accounts as being part of the trading receipts. Since 1937, save as mentioned above, dividends taxed at source have been omitted altogether from the accounts of a dealer in stocks and shares.

Lord Reid said there were four good reasons why this should be so: (i) it was in accord with long standing practice; (ii) it was simpler and more direct; (iii) it avoided the fiction of having to regard the trader's receipts as including not only the net dividends which he actually received, but also the tax deducted by the company paying the dividends; and (iv) it was more reasonable to say that dividends which had already borne tax should not be brought into any further income tax calculation, than to say that they could be brought in so as to swell the assessment of profits under Case I of Schedule D, but that there must then be an abatement not authorized by the 1952 Act.

Viscount Radcliffe said that rule 15 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I and II of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918 (now repealed), assumed that, failing specific statutory direction, the correct form of assessment required the exclusion of dividends from the computation, and such a rule could be directly traced in the words of section 22 (2) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945; section 18 (3) of the Finance Act, 1954, and section 4 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1955. The wording employed, which spoke of dividends which would fall to be taken into account as trading receipts but for the fact that they had been subjected to tax under other provisions of the Income Tax Acts, seemed to recognize clearly enough the 'general accountancy claim' and the special reason why, for tax purposes, dividends were excluded from trading assessments.

It must be taken to be long-established and regular practice to exclude taxed interest and dividends from the computation, and in the case of finance companies this practice was so stated in an affidavit which was reported as having been placed before the Court in R. v. City of London Income Tax Commissioners (1904, 91 L.T. 94). It said:

> 'The income tax authorities always insist on dealing separately with such investments on which the income tax is deducted at the source, and excluding the same from the profits of the trade for the purposes of assessment thereof under Schedule D, and I believe they have the right to do so.'

Summary

It seems, therefore, that accountancy practice, with respect to loss relief under section 341 of the 1952 Act, is basically back where it was following the passing of the Finance Act, 1937; and although the judgments of the Lords in the F.S. Securities case do not say so in terms, that the decision in that case applies to all traders assessed under Case I of Schedule D, and not merely to dealers in stocks and shares who are assessed to income tax under that case. It may, however, be useful to set out in tabular form below the effect of the cases and statutory provisions discussed above.

Before 1937. Dividends omitted from calculation of profits of stock and share dealer. Dividends included in calculating losses.

Finance Act, 1937, section 13: Income Tax Act, 1952, section 341 (3). Dividends omitted in calculating profits and losses.

F.S. Securities Ltd v. C.I.R. (decision of Court of Appeal). Taxed dividends trading income of controlled investment company.

Argosam Finance Co Ltd v. Oxby and C.I.R. Change of practice seen on part of Revenue. Contention that taxed dividend should be included in trading account of finance company.

Weekly Notes

DOCUMENT ON INCOMES ACCEPTED

THE Government has travelled one stage further in its efforts to establish a national incomes policy. At a meeting on Monday the National Economic Development Council accepted a document on which the incomes policy will be based.

This paper sets out the criteria which will be used to guide the new National Board for Prices and Incomes which is being set up under Mr Aubrey Jones. It also gives an outline of the terms of reference which the new Board will be expected to fulfil.

The feature of the meeting on Monday was not so much that the document was found to be acceptable as that opposition to its contents seems to have been remarkably slight. The next hurdle will be for the agreement on a national incomes policy to be ratified by such organizations as the Trades Union Congress and the Federation of British Industries. If these endorsements are forthcoming quickly enough it is hoped to present the paper to Parliament just before Easter. This means that agreement has to be reached within the next three weeks.

It was also agreed on Monday that Mr Aubrey Jones should join the National Economic Development Council so that communication is established between N.E.D.C. and the new Board. The division of labour between the two organizations will be that N.E.D.C. will continue to keep the general trend of prices, productivity and incomes under review while the N.B.P.I. deals with specific cases.

E.E.C. ON GOLD

THE European Economic Community, in the person of M Robert Marjolin, has this week expressed a view on the problem of financing international trade. His views are not available in detail but it would appear that his position is somewhere between those who support the de Gaulle view of a fairly rigid version of the classical gold standard being reintroduced and those who wish the present system to continue.

As regards the present system whereby international liquidity is maintained by countries with the reserve currencies running chronic balance of payments deficits, he calls for a change. He favours the gradual establishment of a monetary union of the member countries of the E.E.C. which he sees as the logical outcome of the customs union among them. He considers that the members of the European Common Market are already making a vital contribution to international liquidity and that this should be taken further. There is no doubt that he views with some disquiet an uncontrolled flow of investment by the United States into the E.E.C. and it is on this point that he sounds most like the de Gaullist school of thought.

M Marjolin is, however, concerned this week in Strasbourg to avoid appearing to take up an extreme attitude on these issues. He clearly believes in the inevitability of gradualism. The very temperateness of his views will command attention even if at present they carry only limited influence.

TARIFF WALL GOES UP

IT has been one of the fears of those who favour freer trade that the division of Western Europe into two distinct tariff areas would create in time two mutually exclusive trading blocs – the European Common Market and the European Free Trade Association. Within themselves there might be an impressive dismantling of tariff barriers but looking outward they would discriminate as a whole against each other's goods.

The secretariat of EFTA in Geneva thinks that the first statistical evidence that this is coming about is now available. They say that provisional figures for 1964 show a diversion of Western European trade from traditional channels. Between 1959 and 1963 exports from EFTA to the E.C.M. went up at an average annual rate of 15 per cent. It appears that in 1964 it may only have been by 6 per cent. The result of this was an increase in the deficit accumulated by EFTA with the E.C.M. On the other hand, in the case of imports from the E.C.M. into EFTA there was only a slight fall.

The main decline in exports into the E.C.M. was borne by the United Kingdom, Austria and Switzerland. Indeed the fall in this figure was one aspect of the failure of British exports to show much resilience in 1964.

In contrast to the trade pattern which seems to be developing between the two tariff areas, trade within EFTA has continued to expand significantly. It seems likely that the surcharge imposed by the United Kingdom late last autumn will not seriously affect the new pattern.

PORTS NAMED FOR DEVELOPMENT

ON Monday of last week the National Ports Council named the eighteen ports which are to be included in the Council's interim plan for spending over £100 million in the next five years. The plan itself was announced recently at Bristol by Lord Rochdale, Chairman of the Council.

The new plan allows for thirty to forty new deep water berths to be constructed, the scheme being mainly to accommodate dry-cargo vessels. In addition some thirty to forty berths will be renovated over the next five to ten years.

Emphasis has been laid by the Council on the need to improve dry-cargo unloading facilities at British ports but even within this priority there will have to be other priorities established.

THE Rt Hon. Lord Latham, J.P., F.A.C.C.A., gave a dinner for The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants in the Upper Dining Room at the House of Lords on Friday of last week to a number of members of both Houses of Parliament and representatives of the public service, industry, commerce and the educational world.

LAWYER'S AMERICAN TRIP DISALLOWED

A FIRM of solicitors in Bolton has been disallowed the travelling and subsistence expenses of one of its partners who attended, in 1960, the eighty-third annual meeting of the American Bar Association in Washington and the second Commonwealth and Empire Law Conference in Ottawa. The trip lasted six weeks, two of them being spent travelling by sea. The partner was accompanied throughout by his wife for whom the visit was purely social and none of whose expenses were claimed.

During the visit Mr Taylor attended five conference sessions. When he was not at a conference he visited several places, sightseeing and staying with solicitors and examining their methods. He gave evidence to the General Commissioners of Income Tax in Bolton that his purpose in attending the conferences was to maintain his status as a solicitor, to improve his reputation in the United Kingdom and to increase his clientele. He had, in fact, increased his 'know-how', and, as a result of examining other solicitors' methods he had introduced an electric typewriter and had other changes under consideration. He also told the Commissioners that his intention had been to have a holiday with his wife at the same time.

The Commissioners allowed his expenses but, on the Revenue appealing to the High Court, the expenses were disallowed as not having been incurred 'wholly and exclusively' for the purposes of the practice within the meaning of section 137 (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1952. Mr Justice Pennycuick said, according to The Times of March 20th, that, as it appeared from the judgment of Lord Justice Romer in Bentleys, Stokes & Lowless v. Beeson (31 A.T.C. 229), where a person had two distinct purposes in mind when incurring expenditure and one was wholly distinct from the carrying on of the trade or profession, then section 137 (a) prevented any deduction. On the admission of the solicitors there had been a dual purpose in the trip.

This decision will certainly throw some doubt on the inveterate practice of splitting expenditure and allowing a proportion of it. The learned judge declined to comment on an alternative Revenue contention that the expenditure was too remote for a Lancashire solicitor. (Bowden v. Russell & Russell.)

by An Industrious Accountant

CHAPTER 269

YOU never really know where you are with directors. They're so unpredictable. The only strategy to be pursued in order to achieve the planned objective, the only one that has a reasonable chance of success, is to come right down to essentials and appeal to their human feelings.

Consider our canteen costs, for example. We have an annual budget allocated to cover the net cost to the company of its canteen services. They cost plenty, actually, since we charge our staff approximately a third of the overall outlay and bear the remaining two-thirds out of the budget, which is always strained to bursting by the year end. Canteen management steers a precarious course between the ravenous-headed Scylla of the staff demanding bigger helpings, and the finance-conscious Charybdis of the directors incensed at budget over-runs.

I, by the way, am on the canteen management. That's how I know the hazards of the choice.

I first became involved in the foodstuffs business during the war. Returning from lunch in my bachelor digs, balancing with an accountant's keen assessment of values the comparative benefit of an immediate cigarette to still the residual feeling of hunger, or its postponement to the relaxation of the evening (since my packet contained only one solitary smoke), I encountered three typists in the outer office. They looked half starved; bread-and-jam sandwiches, spam rolls and weak tea told the reason why. We exchanged commiserating grins . . . an hour later at the board meeting I was vociferous about the relationship between poor job performance and malnutrition. Another hour later I received an assignment to initiate a company canteen.

It's a long time ago now . . . rations and quotas and coupons, eggs and margarine and whale-meat; I became a culinary expert. We had a three-course lunch for a shilling; the first course was thick soup and the last was cocoa; the chef performed miracles if you didn't ask too many questions. If there were crises, like when the corned beef was 'off', we had successes per contra. In proof, we put on weight rather than the reverse.

Times have changed. Our three-course lunch, with a choice of three main dishes, now costs the staff 2*s* 6*d*; the variety and the quality are alike excellent. We naturally have arguments over the true costs of these lunches. Should we add such overheads as supervision, or depreciation on buildings to the direct costs of food, labour and equipment? We do, of course, to impress the staff with the extra load that the company carries. But costs are climbing steadily. An additional 20 per cent on the 1965 budget, I requested, and the directors rejected the suggestion out of hand. Ridiculous, they protested, and exorbitant; there must be wasteful left-overs; check your competitive quotas. Chicken-and-ham specials once a week were too sumptuous; perhaps outside caterers would be more economical; the afternoon tea-trolley was really a luxury.

I said wistfully that the junior staff would suffer if the helpings were reduced in size, and a silence fell. Then Prinny said thoughtfully that his two boys put away fantastic dinners these days; it was simply incredible what they could tuck away. The managing director commented that his daughter had had a party of her school friends at home last week; nothing too exotic, you understand, just savouries and trifles and cakes and so on; the price had been staggering. I said that my wife had pressed for an immediate increase in her housekeeping allowance; after all, with two boys and a daughter it's no joke. Politicians, said Prinny, talk such damn nonsense about pegging prices in inflationary spirals, but his boys brought their badminton team home to supper. Whew-w! Talk about locusts! Around the table, heads nodded in sympathy.

The chairman sat up briskly. 'Wasting too much time on all this, what?' he said. 'Must see that our young chaps aren't underfed. Put 25 per cent on the budget and review at the half-year. Next item.'

One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.

London Chartered Accountants' Dinner and Dance

The London and District Society of Chartered Accountants held a well-attended Dinner and Dance on Friday of last week at Grosvenor House, Park Lane, when nearly eight hundred members and guests were present. Complete Change

THE first sight of The Imperial Tobacco Company's 1964 accounts induced the kind of surprise the film director aims at when he has the dowdy girl shake out her hair, take the glasses off and become a raving beauty before one's very eyes. In fact it is difficult to recall so complete a change in the accounts presentation of a major British company. Usually change is made by degrees, but Imperial Tobacco has achieved it in one fell swoop.

For years, until the Monopolies Commission forced its revelation, Imperial Tobacco kept secret the trade investment in Gallaher. Neither did the company show its sales and the real extent of the trade investments other than Gallaher, nor the extent of its non-tobacco interests either in asset or earnings form. Conservatism to the extent of secrecy was the order of the day.

But not now. The accounts themselves are in almost ultra-modern form. The group and parent figures and comparisons go to a single narrative, with detail in adjacent notes, and the profit and loss account is given the same treatment.

The Imperial Tobacco reformation, however, is not confined to the form of account presentation. The additional information given is the more essential indication of the change of reporting heart, and much of that change is due to Mr Ernest Partridge, the company's comparatively new chairman, and Mr W. G. McPhie, C.A., the chief accountant responsible for drawing up the new account form.

Divisional Breakdown

The Imperial Tobacco Co has about 60 per cent of the home market trade in cigarettes, including just over half the trade in filter tipped cigarettes, and tobacco is the predominant employer of capital and earner of profits. A divisional analysis of group sales, capital employed and trading profit shown in the 'Review of the Year' reveals that tobacco accounted for sales of £681·5 million, employed capital of £221·6 million and showed trading profits of £27·3 million.

Respective sales, capital and profit figures for paper and board were £11·3 million, £12·2 million and £1·2 million; for distributive trade: £37·6 million, £3·5 million and £600,000; and for general trade: £5·7 million, £7·4 million and nil. This breakdown stems from the reconstitution of the group structure last August, with each division having its own board of management. In future years the divisional trading analysis will include comparative figures.

Included in the report is the physical make-up of each division. The Tobacco Division includes Wills, Player, Ogden and Churchman; the Paper and Board Division, Robert Fletcher & Son and St Anne's Board Mill Co; and the Distributive Trade Division Finlay & Co and Robert Sinclair. The Paper and Board and Distributive Trade Divisions are obviously related to cigarette and tobacco packaging and selling but the General Trade Division takes the company outside the tobacco and allied fields.

Golden Wonder

In the General Trade Division there is Anselm Holdings (London), plastic products manufacturers; Bernat Klein, producers of couture fabrics and knitting wools and yarns; British Nicotine Co, suppliers of nicotine alkaloid and nicotine sulphate for agricultural purposes; Educational & Scientific Developments, producers of teaching machines and programmes, and the Golden Wonder Crisp Co.

The latter company is the reason for the 'Nil return' on General Trade Division profits. The company, in a short time, has captured something over 20 per cent of the potato crisp market but capital spending has been heavy. Setting up three factories has alone cost £5 million and Golden Wonder, which operated at a slight loss in 1963–64, is still unlikely to be profitable this year.

In addition to the four operating divisions, there is Mardon International, a colour printing, box and flexible packaging group, owned fifty-fifty with The British American Tobacco Co. And there are Imperial Tobacco's quoted trade investments with a market value of over £129 million, which are to be transferred to a new investment subsidiary, Imperial Investments.

Imperial Investments

Formation of Imperial Investments to hold and manage Imperial Tobacco's quoted investments was decided upon after a lengthy appraisal of the investment position. The board were baulked in making any tax-free distribution to shareholders because of the inability to achieve a realized capital gain. With heavy preference and loan stocks in issue, a capital reduction distribution was hardly feasible.

What the formation of Imperial Investments will do is to underwrite the Imperial Tobacco Co's dividend. For 1963–64, ordinary dividend absorbs about £11 million, towards which investment income (net) contributes some £6 million. The balance of £5 million, derived from trading profits, is covered some two and a half times.

Finally, reference should be made to 'Sales, Profits and Funds Utilized' and 'Summary of Balance Sheets', which are included in the reprint to the extent of three years – for space reasons – but which cover ten years in the original. This detail, together with the new account form, the divisional breakdown, and the divisional and investment figures make up an annual report of outstanding merit.

Supplementary notes

1 The parent company and certain of its subsidiaries have given guarantees in connection with employees' pension schemes. There are obligations thereunder not provided for in these accounts, which may involve annual payments from 1965 onwards dependent upon future actuarial valuations.

2 The approximate amounts of contracts for capital expenditure not provided for in the accounts are:

	1964 £000's	1963 £000's
Group	7,050	6,740
Parent company	5,620	3,590

3 There existed at 31st October 1964 a contract for the parent company to acquire a 75% interest in Anselm Holdings (London) Ltd on 2nd November 1964 at a cost of £750,000 plus further amounts up to a maximum of £550,000 contingent on future profits of that company.

4 There is a contingent liability of £450,000 on a holding of the parent company of 500,000 'A' ordinary shares of £1 (2/– paid) in the Commonwealth Development Finance Company Ltd.

5 Assets and liabilities in foreign currencies have been converted into sterling on the following bases:
(a) fixed assets in U.S.A. and Canada purchased before 31st October 1939: at $4.86 to £1.
(b) other fixed assets: at rates ruling when purchased.
(c) current assets and liabilities: at the rates of exchange ruling on 31st October 1964.

6 The Directors are of the opinion that the financial year of a subsidiary engaged in buying leaf tobacco abroad should terminate soon after the end of the buying season and for this reason the accounts of that company are made up to 30th April in each year.

CITY NOTES

IN anticipation of the possibility that the fall in the stock-markets has more than discounted the Budget, no matter what Mr Callaghan has in store, the market has indulged in a pre-Budget rally. Shortage of shares and a tight technical position has tended to exaggerate the effect of comparatively modest support.

An equity rally after the Budget has been generally predicted but buyers now seem prepared to anticipate the post-Budget improvement. On the basis that nothing encourages buyers more than rising prices, jobbers have been of a mind to mark up quotations quite sharply.

Institutional investors, however, are already looking beyond the Budget and towards a year in which industrial profits are likely to be under severe pressure. That is one reason why the run of pre-Budget profit and dividends statements has failed to inject any degree of optimism into the equity market.

This time next year, it is anticipated, maintained dividends will be just as much the rule as higher payments are at present. At the same time it must be acknowledged that yields on many front rank equities are now relatively high.

Most advanced electronic calculator in existence?

Probably

Most beautifully designed?

Certainly

The new Friden* 130 Electronic Calculator is mid-way between a mechanical desk calculator and an electronic computer. It has no moving parts — all calculations are performed by solid-state electronic components, and entries and answers are displayed on a cathode ray tube like a miniature T.V. screen. It works in milliseconds and it works silently.

Operation of the 130 is through a very simple keyboard with clearly marked controls. Results appear on four registers making it possible to work on multistop problems in logical order without manually re-entering amounts. All entries and answers are automatically aligned around a selected decimal point. In classic simplicity and elegance of design, it is unmatched among today's office machines.

Dates in Company Reports

SIR, – I am anxious to get an authoritative statement on the dates which should appear in a company's annual report. It is the practice of my board to meet early in February to receive and approve the audited accounts, which are signed at the meeting by two directors and the auditor himself immediately signs his report. The announcement to the Press is made over the telephone at the close of the meeting.

The notice of the meeting, the auditor's report and the directors' report all bear the same date, in this case, February 9th, 1965, although to allow for printing the meeting is not called until March 31st.

I have examined a number of accounts and with certain companies the directors' report is not dated. In a number of them the auditor's report is dated a few days earlier than the directors' report or the notice of the meeting, while in several of them the notice of the meeting and the directors' report are dated twenty-three days before the annual general meeting, although the audited results had been known to the Press probably a month earlier.

Could any readers state what is the best practice, please?

Yours faithfully,

Birmingham. C. H. R. FANCOTE.

The Free Pension Danger

SIR, – My company has an approved funded pension scheme for works employees which embraces employees not older than 55 next birthday on admission to the scheme. At the inception of the scheme some years ago employees too old to join were promised small pensions on retirement at age 65, the amount varying with length of service. This liability has not been funded by the company and approval of the Inland Revenue has not been sought.

With these facts in my mind, Mr William Phillips's article 'The Free Pension Danger' (March 13th issue), so alarmed me that I referred to sections 386–391 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, where I hope I found some relief. It appears that where a company does not make any payment to secure the provision of retirement benefits, no sum can be deemed the income of, and assessed on, the employee unless 'the circumstances in which the benefits are to accrue are not such as will render the benefits assessable to income tax under Schedule E as emoluments . . . of his employment' (section 386 (2) (c)).

The pension when paid will be taxable on the retired employee and therefore I think my company's arrangement is outside the provisions of Mr Phillips's article. It is surprising that an acknowledged expert in his field should have failed to make reference to such an important proviso which in many cases would remove the 'free pension danger'. Therefore I should be grateful for confirmation of my views.

Yours faithfully,

TIMARU.

[Mr Phillips writes: It is just one more complication in the 1947 legislation that, to cover a special case made known to the Legislature, paragraph (c) was inserted into what is now section 386 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, to exempt from the effect of that subsection certain payments which unfortunately fell within the definition of 'retirement benefits' but were due to be paid while employment continued. Of course, each of the 'small pensions on retirement at age 65' which 'Timaru's' company has agreed to pay will, like any other annuity, be taxed, but it will not be taxed 'as emoluments of . . . employment', since employment will have ceased. Reflection will show that if 'Timaru's' interpretation of paragraph (c) were correct it would make the whole of subsection (2) nugatory except as applied to lump-sum retirement benefits.]

Employee Shareholding Schemes

SIR, – In recent months, the Wider Share Ownership Council has been receiving a greatly increased volume of serious inquiries from companies for information about employee shareholding schemes which would suit their particular needs.

Though the Council has a considerable volume of literature on the subject, the time now seems ripe to bring it completely up to date and to make it as comprehensive as possible, so that we may provide the necessary advice and information when requested.

May I, therefore, request the courtesy of your columns to ask all company managements with their own employee shareholding scheme to send me their printed literature describing the scheme. Even in those cases where the scheme is well known and where it is likely that we already have details, I would be glad to receive the latest editions of their printed literature so that our files may be completely up to date.

Yours faithfully,

GEORGE COPEMAN,
Hon. Secretary,

Techniques of Communications in Business

by C. F. DEVERELL, M.A., B.SC.(ECON.), B.COM., F.C.I.S. (Gee & Co (Publishers) Ltd, London. 27*s* 6*d* net.)

Mr Deverell, who is head of the Department of Professional Studies in Business Administration at Brighton Technical College, makes it clear in his introduction that his book is aimed both at students of management studies and also at supervisory staff in businesses. For this reason he sets out to cover a wide range of subjects. The book is divided into two sections – the first dealing with general considerations, and the second with applications. There is sound advice in both parts.

In places it is a very personal book, and the individual views of Mr Deverell come clearly through; this has a refreshing effect. In the first chapter Mr Deverell rides as a hobby-horse that 'we have not captured everywhere the vital spark of interest and alertness which brings with it full identification with the progress of an organization'. But, of course, a personal approach to the subject is rather less satisfactory when questions of style are being discussed; the chapter on the use of language makes more good points than the rest of the book succeeds in putting into practice.

As soon as the book begins to be practical it is much more successful. At the end of Part I there appears an admirable check-list to be applied to any form of communication. This is the kind of exact, analytical and non-literary communication that the author is good at. A similar check-list on reports and a note about costing reports (surprisingly leaving overheads out of account, which appears to indicate the wrong choice of costing convention), and a technique called the 'correspondence audit', are well described.

Towards the end, the book appears to range rather too widely over such matters as preparing speeches, the use of visual aids, interviewing, and the conduct of conferences and committees.

It is not until the last sixty pages that Mr Deverell really gets back to the subject, with chapters on giving information to employees, joint consultation and the problems of supervisors. These are excellent chapters which flow much more easily. But the book as a whole is rather too much of a textbook; a little slow moving and somewhat humourless, which forswears the semicolon yet delights in the rhetorical question.

The Impact of Computers on Accounting

by T. W. MCRAE, C.A. (John Wiley & Sons Ltd, London. 42*s* net.)

The theme of Mr McRae's book is two-fold; first he urges Great Britain in particular but Europe also to become far more computer-minded, and secondly, he warns accountants that if they do not learn computer techniques they will, in his opinion, decline to the fullfilling of a minor technical role.

Throughout his book which is clearly and entertainingly written, Mr McRae has demonstrated the enormous potential that the modern computer possesses, and the obvious necessity for management to make full use of these machines, not simply as a super book-keeping instrument but as a piece of equipment that can perform long and complex analyses of data fed into it for management purposes.

In his warning to accountants, however, although Mr McRae has shown the desirability for them to be aware of the computer, the case does not seem to be clearly demonstrated for the accountant to be familiar with such techniques as programming and elementary circuitry, etc. The author himself suggests that readers can skip the first chapter of his book and it does seem that the later chapters dealing with audit and control, and the structure of management in an electronic data processing system are more directly concerned with accountants' functions.

This book can be well recommended to the layman, whether he be an accountant or not, to give an illuminative background to the development of the computer. The book shows clearly the desirability for the accountant and any other member of the management team in industry to be aware of the computer and the uses to which it can be put, but with the rapid technological advance in this field, it would seem dangerous to suggest that unless the accountant is fully conversant with the complex technicalities involved he will cease to hold his place in the management team. After all there are few car drivers who are motor mechanics.

Topics in Business Finance and Accounting

by J. W. BENNETT, B.COM., J. MCB. GRANT, M.ECON., and R. H. PARKER, B.SC.(ECON.). (F. W. Cheshire Pty Ltd, Melbourne; London, Angus & Robertson Ltd. 40*s*.)

It used to be said of accountancy that it was not necessary to have any great skill or knowledge of mathematics and that book-keeping depended more on common sense than anything else. In a broadside in their introduction to this book the authors attack the 'seeming but illusory precision of the double-entry technique', quoting with obvious approval Professor Russell Mathews: 'Conventional accounting procedures have erected a façade of technical precision on implicit assumptions which had their origin in conditions of a past age. The precision is, to a large extent, a sham'.

In the following chapters the authors demonstrate the effect of the time factor in establishing criteria for financial decisions and reporting on the results of those decisions. Starting with simple and compound interest calculations they show how annuities can be calculated and bases established. Then they consider how to reduce to a formula the shareholder's desired optimum return over the period, and how an investment decision may be solved by mathematics. From this they move to project evaluation, which attempts to avoid the bias in favour of a short-term project given by a normal average-profits return forecast; then follows a comparison of the economist's view of capital and, indeed, profits, with that of the accountant. It may well seem to some readers that on inventory values the accountant's reasoning more properly allocates profits than the economist's, even if he tends to ignore the depreciation in currency values in retaining cost figures over short trading accounts periods (e.g. twelve months). Depreciation is discussed and the relationship examined between hiring and sinking fund calculations, and of historical cost-depreciation to balance sheet values.

An interesting survey of various methods of raising finance and the evaluation of the value and cost of such methods then follows, and there is a useful chapter on valuation of super-profits (goodwill) included in the valuation of a business (i.e. unquoted shares) as a whole. Interest and annuity tables, a notation and a selected bibliography complete the book.

It is quite remarkable how much has been squeezed into the compass of a fairly slim volume. Accountants in general may find themselves agreeing with many of the conclusions while having reservations on the necessity of involved calculations to get there; but to the mathematically-minded the formulae make sense, with the advantage of general application. In any case, almost all the equations and formulae are explained in simple terms, one leading naturally to another, and the book may well help to narrow the division – which the authors rightly call 'arbitrary' – between accountancy and economics if taken at the right level of studies.

Control of a Business

by JOHN HOLBROOK and TERRY PRICHARD. (Business Publications Ltd, London. 40*s* net.)

At first sight this is another rather expensive book following a well-worn path. The authors speak from experience as management consultants and, after an excellent introductory chapter on the considerations affecting business success, settle down to detailed discussions of different aspects of control. They do the job very competently, in a flowing and slightly academic style.

One may wonder why another book on management control is necessary. The authors' implication that most readers will be surprised to learn that management control information extends far beyond strict accounting data is not valid in 1965. In the same way, a discussion towards the end of the book dealing with the use of the computer within a business and its role in decision-making says nothing new. But books like this are necessary as reviews at a point of time of current thinking on aspects of business management. If accepted as one of these reviews, which can conveniently be read in a few hours as revision for forward-looking management and as good basic stuff for students, it has its place and deserves a good readership.

The authors are slightly critical of accountants and their weapons. No-one wants to suggest that the accountant, any more than the economist or the operational researcher, is the only effective aide to management. It is accepted that a team approach is what is required, and the accountant quite certainly earns a place in the team. Thus it is important for books such as these to resist the temptation to snipe; and it is particularly rash to snipe a little and give in an appendix a set of management control returns upon which accountants could cheerfully improve.

The book has something worth while to say, but like many other works on management subjects there is barely enough original matter to fill a whole book. Thus the authors fill in with sound re-statement of old material, or rather sketchy treatment of a subject like critical path planning.

Fundamentals of Auditing

Second edition, by R. K. MAUTZ, PH.D., C.P.A. (John Wiley & Sons Ltd, London. 68*s* net.)

Professor Mautz, who is well known both as Professor of Accountancy at the University of Illinois and as a contributor to journals and research publications of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants and the National Accounting Association (of America), can also claim considerable practical experience in the field of professional accountancy. His definition of auditing is therefore of immediate interest. He says:

> 'An audit seeks to establish the reliability or unreliability of the financial statements and supporting accounting records of a company or institution. That is, an audit is an effort to discover whether or not the financial statements do actually portray the financial position and the results of operations of the company or institution under examination.'

This is surely a definition acceptable to auditors of all countries and we therefore approached with interest and anticipation the remainder of the book which is designed for a first course in auditing or, together with A Short Audit Case (published separately) a two-course series.

From a general survey of the nature and purpose of auditing, the book proceeds to errors and adjustments, then a chapter written for this edition on 'The Theory of Audit Evidence' – a survey of the factors enabling the auditor to make the necessary judgements and to arrive at his opinion, which points out that one entry in a set of books may well require examination in several different contexts if the final opinion is to be a sound one. This chapter includes a valuable list of types of audit evidence.

The next two chapters deal with basic techniques and audit working papers. The author wisely prefers a wide variety of working papers to standardized forms and also warns against the habit of copying the previous year's papers without critical appraisal of their relevance. He gives specimen papers referenced, where appropriate, to the adjustment (draft) journal. The example of a 'two last months' bank reconciliation is interesting and thought-provoking.

Then internal control comes under scrutiny with an examination of the 'I.C.Q.' (internal control questionnaire) now in common use in some form or other. Chapters follow on audit programmes, including the personal judgement needed in applying statistical sampling techniques; problems of balance sheet verifications; an amplification of the relationship between internal control and the audit; management or efficiency auditing; report writing and special problems.

This is an excellent book for student and auditing practitioner alike. True, it is sprinkled with extracts from Statements on Auditing Procedures issued by the American Institute and deals mainly with auditing in the U.S.A., rather than looking further to the special problems of other countries, yet it would do practitioners everywhere a power of good to read it as a reminder of those sound first principles in the art, which must always remain their primary concern.

The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants

Corporation Tax and Capital Gains Tax

MEMORANDUM TO THE CHANCELLOR

In response to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's invitation to representative bodies to comment on his proposals to introduce corporation tax and capital gains tax, the Council of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants has submitted the following matters for consideration. Comment on the memorandum appears on another page.

CORPORATION TAX

1. Rate of Tax

The rate of corporation tax will not, according to the Chancellor, be announced until the Budget in April 1966. Accordingly, in respect of at least a full year's operations of all existing companies up to April 1966, the amount of profit available for distribution to the shareholders will be unknown. Under these circumstances up to the Budget of 1966, companies will need to make provisions for corporation tax on the most conservative basis before declaring a dividend. The effect of this is bound to be a holding back of public investment in industry. In addition the same uncertainty as to the tax effects of investment in industry may prevent industrialists from utilizing their resources most effectively. The National Economic Development Council in its booklet Investment Appraisal counsels the use of discounted cash flow techniques in appraising the worth of any investment, and insists that tax charges must be brought into account in estimating future cash flows. Despite the advice contained in paragraph 30 of N.E.D.C.'s booklet it is hard to see in the present climate of uncertainty how scientific appraisal techniques can be usefully applied unless an announcement of the initial rate of corporation tax is made in the forthcoming Budget. It is regrettable that the good advice of a Government-sponsored organization should be made ineffectual by the present uncertainty as to the rate of tax, quite apart from its incidence.

The Council requests that the Chancellor declare the initial rate of corporation tax in the Budget for 1965.

2. Capital Allowances

It has been stated that capital allowances for corporation tax purposes will be on the same basis as for income tax and profits tax. If this means that the original cost of certain fixed assets, together with investment allowances where appropriate, are to be allowed over a period as a charge against income to be assessed to corporation tax then, at any conceivable rate of corporation tax, the cash value of capital allowances will be reduced. The incentive to invest in fixed assets will be less; and this is bound to hinder the future growth of the economy. The special benefits of scientific research allowances and allowances for capital expenditure in development districts will be reduced with a consequential reduction in expenditure on assets qualifying for these allowances. This seems to contradict current Government policy, because of the obviously detrimental effects on the expansion of industry.

A further serious problem arises in the case of existing assets on which further capital allowances remain to be granted. A large reduction in the cash value of these further allowances would represent a breach of faith with industry, which had anticipated that the cash value of capital allowances would not be materially altered during the life of the assets involved.

If the Chancellor is unable to agree to the adjustment of all capital allowances, the Council requests that as an absolute minimum, transitional arrangements should be made in respect of all capital allowances on expenditure incurred before the Budget of 1965 and on subsequent expenditure to which companies are committed at that date.

3. Preference Dividends

The Council understands that one of the aims of the total separation of taxation of companies from taxation of dividends received by the holders of shares in the companies, is to encourage the retention of distributable profits by companies.

The Council takes the view that such retention of profits is not invariably beneficial to the economy, but recognizes that this is an aim of current Government policy. Industry will undoubtedly be encouraged to retain more of the profits available for distribution to Ordinary shareholders than hitherto, but this cannot apply to dividends on Preference share capital. If profits are available Preference dividends must be paid.

Should the Chancellor maintain his original intention not to allow the deduction of Preference dividends before charging profits to corporation tax, then profits available for distribution to holders of Ordinary shares in companies with Preference share capital will be disproportionately reduced and perhaps extinguished. In certain cases it is also true that profits which were formerly adequate to meet Preference dividends would no longer be adequate under corporation tax.

In the past it has been desirable for certain companies to finance part of their operations by the issue of Preference share capital whereas other companies have issued debentures and other secured loans which carried greater security than Preference shares with fractionally lower rates of interest. Under the Chancellor's current proposals the original economic basis for the issuance of Preference share capital will be overthrown and a disproportionate hardship will be placed on companies with existing Preference share capital and on holders of shares both Ordinary and Preference in such companies. Further investment in such companies will be arbitrarily discouraged.

The Council requests that in the interests of the economy and of equity the Chancellor should allow Preference dividends to be treated as a charge against profits in the same way as interest payments.

4. Double Taxation Relief

It has been stated that companies eligible for double taxation relief will receive such relief only to the extent of the corporation tax paid by such companies. Currently, overseas tax rates are in general less than the combined rates of United Kingdom income tax and profits tax and most companies with overseas income are allowed double taxation relief in respect of all overseas taxes on income derived abroad. It is clear that corporation tax will be at a rate lower than most overseas tax rates. In general therefore companies will not obtain double taxation relief in full, if double taxation relief is given only against corporation tax. This treatment will place companies with overseas income at a disadvantage as compared with companies whose income is earned in the U.K.

The economic consequences in a country with such considerable overseas investment as the U.K. are obvious. Much of this overseas investment is made to preserve markets which would otherwise be permanently lost and as the only alternative to exports from U.K. at possibly uncompetitive prices. The Chancellor has indicated that transitional arrangements may be made to ease this problem, but it is clear that a large part of the investment overseas is of a permanent character and an equitable permanent solution to the problem is essential.

The Council requests that the Chancellor should make permanent arrangements to obviate the economic hardship which must ensue if he follows his stated policy on double taxation relief.

5. Dividends Franked for Corporation Tax

The Council welcomes the assurance of the Chancellor that dividends paid to a parent company by a subsidiary company assessable to corporation tax will not be charged again to corporation tax. This, however, is not a sufficient safeguard in the view of the Council, against the double taxation of income. All profits which have been charged to corporation tax should not, in the interests of equity, be charged again to corporation tax.

The Council requests that all dividends paid out of profits which have suffered corporation tax should be 'franked' as at present for profits tax purposes.

6. The Council requests that the Chancellor should also consider and deal with the following points:

- (a) profits retained by companies which have already suffered income tax and profits tax on such profits, should not be further charged to income tax on distribution;
- (b) payments made under deed of covenant should be allowable as deductions from profits chargeable to corporation tax;
- (c) abatement of corporation tax should be introduced on a similar basis as for profits tax;
- (d) grouping notices for corporation tax should be allowed as for profits tax;
- (e) having regard to the fact that corporation tax will be levied on an accounts basis, terminal loss provisions should be introduced for corporation tax, to enable companies to avoid paying corporation tax on more than their total profits less terminal losses;
- (f) under corporation tax many small companies will face a conflict between the inducement to retain profits in the business and the opposite effects of present surtax provisions. This difficulty requires to be resolved.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

7. Real and Apparent Gains

The Council requests that the Chancellor distinguish between gains which arise as a result of a real increase in value of an asset and those apparent gains produced by inflationary movements of the currency. Under no circumstances can the Council accept that a rational argument can be advanced for the taxation of increases in apparent value produced by inflation. The treatment of such inflationary increases forms part of a general proposal of the Council on inflation on paragraph 8 of these recommendations.

Any gains tax, however assessed, should be charged only on those gains produced after adjusting the original cost to current money values.

Assuming that a gains tax on accretions of value is to be levied the Council requests that:

(a) gains on the disposal of the assets of a business should not be taxed if re-invested in the business;

(b) losses on disposal of assets should be set off against gains;

(c) capital gains should not be taxed both in the hands of corporations and shareholders of the corporations (including corporate shareholders);

(d) professional charges incurred in computing the assessable gain or loss should be allowable charges for gains tax purposes.

8. Inflation and Capital Allowances

The Council considers that taxation legislation which recognizes the existence of inflation as a serious economic fact is long overdue.

As regards business assets eligible for capital allowances it should be a fundamental principle for taxation purposes, that the costs chargeable against income derived therefrom should be in the same real monetary terms. Even a contained rate of continuous inflation, such as appears inevitable in a modern economy, operates against this basic principle.

Under conditions of inflation, the fact that capital allowances are based on historic cost and spread over the life of capital assets, results in a progressive diminution of the real value of such capital allowances in years subsequent to the year of purchase. In fact, true costs are thus never allowed in full for taxation purposes and the longer the life of an asset the more serious does this position become.

Except in development districts there is a clear discrimination against those businesses, in particular the heavy industries which are so vital to our economy, which necessarily call for a high proportion of capital investment in fixed assets. This is obviously inequitable and bad from an economic standpoint.

The Council requests that capital allowances should be adjusted by price indices so that the true cost as adjusted for inflation be allowed against business profits over the life of an asset.

9. Additional Matters

The Council suggests that the Chancellor should consider and deal with the following points:

(a) offices, showrooms and other similar business premises are as much part of a business enterprise as industrial buildings and should be eligible for allowances in the same way as industrial buildings;

(b) consideration should be given to the introduction of special rates of investment allowances in respect of expenditure upon fixed assets of particular significance to the economy at any period of time;

(c) revenue expenditure on scientific research may exceed by many times the original capital expenditure on which current tax incentives are based. The Council considers that the scientific research capital allowances should be supplemented by a special allowance on revenue expenditure;

(d) it has been suggested that investment allowances may no longer be given in respect of expenditure on assets leased to a user. The Council wishes to emphasize that investment allowances should be retained as at present in any case for those assets leased to an industrial user;

(e) it is clear that current Government policy is to emphasize the importance of exporting to maintain the industrial health of the economy. Direct tax concessions to exporters may not be possible in the light of international trade and tariff agreements. The Council feels, however, that consideration should be given to a scheme for providing an export incentive, by delaying the collection of tax for a substantial period on a proportion of a taxpayer's profits based upon the relationship between exports and total sales.

10. Business Rationalization

The Council recognizes that the complication of the present tax system reflects to a large extent the complexity of a modern industrial community. It is clear that taxation, to be equitable in such a community, must recognize the widely differing tax status of taxpayers. Nevertheless the Council feels that the inauguration of a new tax system provides a unique opportunity for simplifying the tax structure, by eliminating unnecessary complexities.

It has been found by industry that reconstructions inside groups of companies, which are highly desirable for economic reasons and to optimize managerial expertise, are frequently frustrated by tax regulations which appear to provide little benefit to the economy, but whose application presents unnecessary obstacles to the most efficient use of industrial resources. The Council sees little administrative difficulty but much good economic sense in assessing a group of companies as one taxpayer, as for example the current profits tax legislation on grouping to some extent permits.

It is clear that the current legislation on separate trades is designed to prevent serious abuses of the tax system and this is obviously desirable, but the Council feels that the implementation of the tax law has tended to stifle business enterprise.

It is essential that in a modern economy management must be flexible and able to organize business in the most efficient manner. Taxation law must be bad if it prevents or militates against this important requirement. Section 17 of Income Tax Act, 1952, together with the rules for dealing with the assessment of new businesses and cessations, whilst framed to prevent abuses, do in fact operate restrictively on management.

The Council recommends that greater flexibility should be given in the administration of the law to permit and encourage the reconstruction of businesses, where it can be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Revenue authorities that no abuse or evasion of taxation will result.

PAYMENT OF TAXES

Due Dates for Payment

THE due dates for payment of taxes are as follows: All income tax assessed on limited companies is payable in full on January 1st in the year of assessment.

Income tax is payable by individuals and firms as follows:

(a) under Schedule B, on woodlands occupied on a commercial basis (where no election has been made for the assessment to be under Schedule D), in full on January 1st in the year of assessment;

(b) under Schedule D, tax on earned income (e.g. profits under Cases I and II) is payable in two equal instalments on January 1st in the year of assessment and on the following July 1st. Tax on unearned income (e.g. Cases III to VIII) is payable in full on January 1st in the year of assessment;

(c) under Schedule E, tax is payable under the Pay-As-You-Earn provisions.

Surtax is payable on January 1st following the year of assessment.

If an assessment is not raised until after the due date, the tax is payable immediately after the assessment has been made.

Profits tax is payable one month after the date of the assessment.

Interest on Arrears of Tax

Interest at 3 per cent per annum is chargeable from the due date to the actual date of payment if income tax under Schedule D, surtax or profits tax, is not paid within three months of becoming due. However, no interest is payable if –

(1) the total tax on an assessment does not exceed £1,000, or

(2) the interest does not exceed £1.

Thus, if a second instalment of less than £1,000 tax is unpaid but the total tax charged by the assessment exceeded that amount, any unpaid balance will attract interest.

The interest is payable without deduction of income tax and does not rank for relief from income tax, surtax or profits tax.

Where a tax liability which has been paid is later discharged, the tax overpaid may be taken as having been originally paid in satisfaction of any arrears of tax which may have been outstanding under another heading, and a refund of interest charged will be made.

Illustration

Income tax under Case I for 1963–64 of £30,000 was not paid until August 31st, 1964, although the assessment had been raised and agreed before January 1st, 1964. As a result interest amounting to £600 was charged and paid. On March 13th, 1964, a Case III assessment for 1963–64 was raised, and £2,500 tax was demanded and paid in full the next day. In September 1964, the Case III liability was reduced to £1,500 and the overpayment of £1,000 was refunded. This repayment would be treated as equivalent to a discharge of £1,000 of the Case I assessment and a repayment of the interest charged on £1,000 of the Case I arrears would be made as follows:

3 per cent on £1,000 for the period from January 1st, 1964, to August 31st, 1964 = £20.

Tax Reserve Certificates

Tax Reserve Certificates may be purchased by any person (individual, partnership or body corporate) as a means of making provision in advance for income tax (other than under Schedule E), surtax or profits tax.

The certificates can be bought through banks in multiples of £5. If used in payment of tax they carry interest, at the rate ruling at the date of issue, for each complete month from the date of the certificate to the date on which the tax is deemed to become due. For this purpose, tax that is assessed or agreed late is nevertheless deemed to be due on the normal date(s), and profits tax is deemed to be due on the day following the end of a period of six months after the end of the chargeable accounting period in respect of which the tax is payable. The interest is exempt from all taxation.

A Tax Reserve Certificate cannot be used in payment of tax due less than two months after the date of the certificate, and does not earn interest for more than two years. But certificates may be held for an indefinite length of time and may at any time be cashed for their face value if not tendered in payment of tax.

The rate of interest allowed varies from time to time – it was increased from 2¾ to 3½ per cent on November 28th, 1964. This represents a high gross yield to individuals with large incomes. For instance, to a taxpayer liable to surtax at highest rate, the present rate of interest is equivalent to a gross yield of 31·11 per cent as will be seen from the following calculation.

Less: Income tax at ..		7	9

Where the amount of a certificate, together with interest, exceeds the tax payable there will be calculated the principal sum which, with interest thereon, is equal to the tax. The excess of the amount of the certificate will then be refunded in the form of a balance certificate bearing the same date as the original certificate, or if desired, in cash. A balance of less than £5 will, in any event, be refunded in cash.

Tax Reserve Certificates are not transferable. A partnership certificate cannot be used to discharge a partner's liability on private incomes, but a partner's certificate may be used against his share of the partnership liability.

Illustration

M. bought a Tax Reserve Certificate for £2,000 on February 10th, 1963, when the rate of interest was 2¼ per cent. He appealed against an estimated surtax assessment for 1962–63, dated January 31st, 1964, and the amended amount was not agreed until March 20th, 1964. The agreed liability was £1,437 10s.

For the purpose of the use of the Tax Reserve Certificate (and only for that purpose), the surtax is deemed to have been payable on January 1st, 1964. That part of the amount of the certificate which with interest at 2¼ per cent for ten months (i.e. the number of complete calendar months between February 10th, 1963, and January 1st, 1964) amounts to £1,437 10s may be used in settlement of the liability. The amount of the certificate to be surrendered in these circumstances may be calculated as follows:

$$\text{P(Principal)} = £1{,}437\ 10s \times \frac{100}{100 + (2\frac{1}{4} \times \frac{10}{12})}$$

$$\text{P} = £1{,}411\ 0s\ 10d.$$

Proof = £1,411 0s 10*d* plus interest thereon at 2¼ per cent for ten months (£26 9s 2*d*) = £1,437 10s.

A balance certificate for £588 19s 2*d* dated February 10th, 1963, would then be issued which, if used subsequently for payment of tax, would also carry interest at 2¼ per cent. Or, if M. wished, the whole of the balance would be repaid by cheque (without interest).

For the purpose of any charge to interest, if the surtax were left unpaid, the due date for payment would be March 20th, 1964, and only if payment were not made by June 20th, 1964, would interest be charged (from March 20th, 1964, to the actual date of payment).

INTRODUCTORY COURSES FOR NEWLY-ARTICLED CLERKS IN LONDON

THE London Chartered Accountants' Students' Society has just completed its sixth three-week introductory course which was attended by sixty-one students at the beginning of their articles. The total number who have taken the five courses in the past twelve months is 459.

The primary purpose of the introductory courses is to give the articled clerk the necessary book knowledge of accounting and auditing so that he can find his feet in the office as early as possible in his training. This should enable him to begin at once to get the best out of the practical experience which is the basic factor in his training and also, by increasing his usefulness in the office, to rise more quickly to responsible work and still better experience.

With this aim in view, the courses concentrate upon the basic subjects of book-keeping and auditing, but they also include an introduction to the profession by lectures from practising members of the Institute. The instruction in the basic subjects is in small tutorials; the wider professional education is given by lectures to the whole course together.

To gain the greatest benefit from these courses they should be taken as early in the period of training as possible. Principals are sending a substantial number of students before they begin work in the office. This timing gives the best results and also helps in the transition from school to practical training.

The tutorial work in the courses is provided mainly by the professional coaches whose fund of experience of the profession is an important element in the maximum benefit to the student. The coaches' tutorials have been supplemented by others provided by local authority colleges of further education so far as their competent teaching staff, accommodation and other conditions allow.

Further courses are planned to begin on May 10th, October 4th and 25th, and others will be organized by the Students' Society as required. Principals are asked to keep these dates in mind when they are considering candidates for articles.

THE GRESHAM PRESS

(a member of the Staples Group of Printers) require a

MANAGEMENT ACCOUNTANT

Applicants should be qualified accountants, aged 28–37, with some industrial accounting experience, although not necessarily in printing, and a knowledge of mechanized accounting systems. The position offers a first-class opportunity for a man with imagination, initiative and ability, to run and develop the budgetary and financial control, management accounting and costing systems.

The Management Accountant will be responsible to the Managing Director for all the financial aspects of the business and would be a member of the senior management team. He will, therefore, be expected to take an interest in the technicalities of printing and the developments in staff communications and relations that are taking place. It is vital he is a 'management' accountant, and not just 'an' accountant.

The Gresham Press is an old-established printing house with a high reputation for quality book and magazine printing. The company – recently amalgamated with Staples Printers Limited – is progressive in technical developments, production methods and management techniques. It faces a period of rapid and considerable expansion. There is a London sales office off the Strand, but the management accountant would be based at the Press. This is in the Surrey countryside at Old Woking, two miles from Woking and six miles from Guildford.

A starting salary of not less than £1,700 will be decided on the basis of industrial, commercial and other experience and will be reviewed annually. There is a pension and life assurance scheme and fully defined conditions of employment covering, inter alia, absence and sick pay, holidays, business expenses and periods of notice. On appointment, assistance with housing and removal can be arranged if necessary.

Applications should be addressed to the Managing Director:

GEE

Efficient Accounting Methods

by HOWARD F. WILSON, F.C.A., M.I.O.M.

The study of methods of accounting has not in the past received nearly as much attention from accountants as has the study of principles. Books describing the simplification of clerical methods and the insistence of the sellers of accounting machines on the superiority of their 'systems' (as distinct from their machines) have persuaded many accountants in industry and commerce that accounting technicalities are not their concern but that of 'experts'.

That this view is not accepted by the leaders of the accountancy profession is shown by (1) the announcement by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland of the introduction of a new examination for a Certificate in Management Information, with a syllabus which will include 'the design of systems and data processing', and (2) the announced intention of the five leading accountancy bodies to introduce a Diploma in Management Accounting Services which will cover (inter alia) 'office organization, methods and equipment'.

Thus the publication of this book (the first in this field written particularly for accountants) is timely and it should prove an excellent textbook for the examinations of both the Certificate and the Diploma. The book is divided into two parts. The first describes methods of carrying out accounting requirements and follows the same sequence as that usually adopted by books on accounting principles. Part 2 is devoted to the use of machines, varying from the typewriter to the computer, not from the standpoint of a machine salesman but dispassionately and critically. The advantages and disadvantages are all stated, and the reader is shown how to assess the value of alternative types of machines by the preparation of cost assessments.

The Chairman, Mr J. Carl Ross, when presenting the report and accounts said: 'Improved trading in every sphere of our operations has resulted in an increase in Group Profits before Taxation from £1,736,312 in 1963 to a record of £2,662,414 in 1964.

On September 30th, 1964, the Group entered the retail fruit and vegetable business by the acquisition of the Waterworth Group of Companies who operate 260 shops in the Liverpool, Manchester, Cheshire and North Wales area. This may prove to be as important an event as that of our entry into the Poultry Industry four years ago. Ross Group profits do not include any contribution from this Group of Companies for the year to September 30th, 1964.

The profits of the Group during the first four months of the current financial year are, according to the preliminary figures so far available, in excess of those for the same period last year. It is anticipated that, in the absence of unforeseen circumstances, the improvement will be maintained.

Commencing with the six months to March 31st, 1965, half-yearly results will be announced.'

BENEFITS OF BID FOR UNITED MOLASSES

SIR IAN LYLE ON WELCOME EXPORT SALES IMPROVEMENT

The 62nd annual general meeting of Tate & Lyle, Limited was held on 24th March in London.

Addressing the meeting, Sir Ian Lyle, the President, said there were two subjects of outstanding importance to the Group – the offer that had just been made for the United Molasses shares and the World raw sugar price which was adversely affecting profits. Dealing with the offer first, and the effects and benefits it would have on the Group, he said:

'Combining our undertakings will provide us with the means to expand both at home and overseas into a commodity that is allied to our own product, and which shares with our own many similar bulk transport problems.'

'We can look to benefits from economies in both shipping and trading as well as in the exchange of the know-how and special techniques which have been developed by each of us separately.'

'In addition, we have always felt that as an International Company, we should have a stake in the United States. This we shall acquire through the Pacific Molasses Company.'

Raw Sugar Price

As to the price of raw sugar, Sir Ian said it had continued its erratic and unpredictable way since he spoke a year ago. It was then in process of falling from a peak of £105 per ton reached the previous November, and had already dropped to £62. There followed a period of comparative stability until the end of May after which the price fell steadily to a figure of £21 on 5th February. Since then there had been a slight recovery and it currently stood at £25 10*s* per ton.

He continued: 'The world price of sugar is controlled by the supply and demand requirements of approximately 20% of total world consumption. Thus it magnifies by a factor of about 4 to 1 the effects of variations in world crops and in the absence of international stabilising machinery, we can expect a continuation of unstable markets.'

'This stop-go, in what would otherwise be a steady expansion in the sugar economy of the world, does nothing to benefit any of the elements engaged in it. Wildly fluctuating prices lead to wildly fluctuating earnings, profits and taxes. Nor are they popular with consumers, who resent high prices and never appear to notice low ones. It is for these reasons that we support the renewed attempts to negotiate an International Sugar Agreement. We have been without an effective world agreement since 1961.'

'The effect of fluctuating prices on trading is complicated and varies in the countries in which we have interests. In the United Kingdom the combination of the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement, the financial arrangements of the British Sugar Corporation and the accounting procedures of the Sugar Board as they have operated for the past year or so, largely insulate British consumers from the effects of fluctuating prices.'

'This smoothing out operation for the benefit of the consumer is done through the imposition by the Sugar Board of a levy on sugar which varies inversely with the price of sugar. As refiners, we pay both fluctuating prices and fluctuating levies for our raw product. Consequently, we are vulnerable to stock losses or profits on both accounts. To eliminate their fortuitous effect on company results we have adopted a system of base stocks and this has been effective in preventing extreme distortion in gross profits.'

Home Refining

'The refining operations at home remain the most important part of the Group's activities. They contributed 37% of Group profits, a lower proportion than usual due to another exceptional year for the raw sugar companies which swelled the total profits of the Group, but also due to a reduction of refining profits themselves. This reduction resulted in part from the absence of favourable trading conditions and in part to a fall of 5½% in home trade sales and a consequent increase in costs. We hope to improve on the volume of sales in the current year and to improve our costs also.'

'Our export sales in 1964 showed a welcome improvement on 1963 of about 30% in profit and 8% in volume; this amounts to 22% of our total output.'

Finally, dealing with prospects for 1965, Sir Ian said that the application of the present low price of raw sugar to the whole of the crop would result in an estimate of consolidated profits before tax for Tate & Lyle for the current year of approximately £6,500,000 which figure would compare with £8,721,000 in respect of the preceding year. There would, he believed, be an improvement in the profits on United Kingdom refining, offset but not completely by a fall in the results from Canadian refining. Shipping and other services were likely to have a satisfactory year and the Zambian and Rhodesian interests would continue at about the present level. A. & W. Smith would have another good year.

The report and accounts were adopted.

Written specifically for students studying company law for their final examinations, this book is designed to be read in conjunction with a recognized textbook on company law and the Companies Act 1948. It includes a summary of many cases together with extracts from judgments and references to the recommendation of the Jenkins Committee on Company Law Reform. From a study of these cases the reader will be able to see how a section of the Act or a case-law principle works in practice.

Basis for the Budget

THAT the economy now requires a touch of the brake to prevent 'over-heating' is not disputed. The question is, just how much? Mr CALLAGHAN and his advisers will make the decision largely on the evidence contained in the now customary pre-Budget economic publications issued on Wednesday.

The most important of these, the preliminary national income and expenditure estimates, shows that 1964 was not – contrary to much pre-election criticism – a year of recession. The gross national product at £28,700 million was 7½ per cent larger than in 1963; in real terms the increase was 5½ per cent. It is gratifying that investment increased proportionately much more, i.e. 25 per cent, than consumption expenditure with only a 6½ per cent increase. This increased investment was largely financed by means of a heavy balance of payments deficit.

The balance of payments figure for 1964 shows that the overall deficit was £745 million compared with a mere £78 million in 1963. The deficit was equally shared by the current and capital accounts. The deterioration was due largely to a rapid growth in imports which were £657 million higher than in 1963 with a corresponding increase in exports of only £184 million.

Mr CALLAGHAN will surely note that the bulk of the increase in capital outflow was from private sources. The recent measures taken in the U.S.A. to curtail such overseas private investment may attract similar thoughts in Britain.

A more detailed examination of the income and expenditure accounts suggests that Mr CALLAGHAN may not have far to look for his extra revenue. Outlays in 1964 on alcoholic drink were 12 per cent higher, compared with an overall increase in consumption expenditure of 6½ per cent. In contrast, expenditure on tobacco eased off by 4½ per cent. Nor can the CHANCELLOR ignore the implications of the largest single increase of 12⅓ per cent in the purchase of durable goods, accounted for largely by a more than 20 per cent increase in expenditure on cars and motor cycles.

Tax Reform Down Under

WHILE it is unfashionable in economic circles to talk about the 'limits of taxable capacity', no one who has watched the efforts of successive United Kingdom Chancellors to contain avoidance as well as the increasingly evident growth of evasion, can fail to realize that a major review of the tax structure is needed in the face of the ever-mounting level of public expenditure. Perhaps Mr CALLAGHAN, who professes himself aware of present needs, will shortly be giving us some inkling of what he and his advisers have in mind for the future.

In the meantime, however, other countries are actually carrying out such inquiries. In Sweden a Royal Commission has produced the first part of a wide-ranging report on taxation; in the Irish Republic, a consolidation Bill – which is the subject of another article in this issue – also takes in a material degree of tax reform; in Australia the Ligertwood Committee's findings led to important if limited changes in the last Finance Act. Now a group of economists have reviewed the Australian tax system and, while it is never practicable to adopt the recommendations made to meet the fiscal needs of other countries, their report provides an excellent and succinct review of fiscal problems and principles which accountants will find both interesting and stimulating[1].

The Australian income tax is more akin to the American than Britain's, e.g. the continuous progression in rates for successive slices of income and the deductibility of medical expenses. Nor is there, as is the case in Britain, any discrimination in favour of earned as against investment income. According to the authors, while the lower and highest incomes in Australia are less heavily taxed than their equivalents overseas, the middle incomes are taxed more heavily both in respect of the average and marginal rates. They calculate a number of comparative incomes adjusted for the rate of exchange to demonstrate the relative weight of the top marginal rates. Thus, the top marginal rate in Australia is 66·7 per cent which applies to any income over £20,000; in Canada the top rate is 80 per cent on £175,000; in Sweden 65 per cent on £13,000, while in the U.S.A. the top rate is 91 per cent at £89,000. The estimated corresponding figure for the United Kingdom is 89 per cent at £23,000 all earned.

The authors are dissatisfied with the present concept of income and, recognizing the difficulties involved in the taxation of capital gains, recommend the early introduction of a tax on net worth. Such a tax would not only be more equitable than one based solely upon income as defined for the taxing statutes, but would help offset the loss of revenue from evasion and avoidance.

The taxation of corporate profits owes more to the American system than to British law; there is a flat-rate corporation tax which is not credited to the shareholders in respect of their dividends. Such a tax, the authors point out, bears more heavily upon the poorer shareholder than the person of wealth. Furthermore, it provides an inducement to companies to retain profits and allow the shareholders to take the benefits in the form of capital gains. To meet these problems the authors make two proposals. First, they recommend that interest on borrowed money, e.g. debenture interest, should be treated as a distribution of profits.

Secondly, the authors want companies to distribute their entire profits so as to ensure that each shareholder will pay the rate of tax appropriate to his circumstances. This, it will be recalled, is no more than the basic assumption underlying the taxation of profits in the 1802 Income Tax Act. If the company requires additional capital, then it may issue bonus shares, but only with the consent of the shareholders.

A further advantage of this proposal, argue the authors, is that the present discrimination against the retention of profits by private companies could be abandoned since this proposal would effectively limit the use of the corporate structure for tax avoidance. The authors recommend that corporate profits pay a flat rate of tax, i.e. 25 per cent; any retained profits should be charged at 66⅔ per cent. Perhaps Mr CALLAGHAN and his opposite number 'down under' should compare notes on this subject.

Consolidation of Irish Income Tax

THE introduction in the Republic of Ireland of a Bill to consolidate the whole of the Income Tax Acts in force in the State was briefly noted in our issue of February 20th. A parallel task was completed in the United Kingdom some thirteen years ago and despite a recommendation by the Royal Commission that this exercise should be repeated at ten-year intervals commencing in 1962, the prospects of an early consolidation appear slight.

The laborious undertaking represented by the Irish Bill which runs to 551 sections, might reach Herculean proportions in the United Kingdom, particularly when it is considered that such a measure would have to run the gauntlet of Parliament; the Irish Bill is to be introduced with the ATTORNEY-GENERAL's certificate that it is a consolidating measure entitled to be dealt with in accordance with a modified procedure.

It follows that the various points of innovation or distinction as compared with British legislation on which we comment in the following paragraphs owe their appearance to developments over many years. Having regard to the fact that more than thirty years have elapsed since the separation of the Legislatures, it is, however, remarkable that many developments in the United Kingdom have been closely paralleled in the Republic. It may also be the case that innovations of merit in the Republic have not been taken up in the United Kingdom, while in cases where the precedent of British legislation has been followed, the actual form of the Irish rules have differed in important particulars which may point a useful lesson for reforms in the United Kingdom. At any rate, to examine the Irish Bill is to glimpse tantalizing reflections of the British legislation both as it stands and as it might be.

Cross-reference to the existing pattern of Irish Acts is facilitated by an official table of comparison which itself runs to sixteen foolscap pages. It may be seen from this that approximately one-quarter of the matter tabulated is represented by the Income Tax Act, 1918, which contributed something like a third towards the bulk of the 1952 British Act. This suggests that equal volumes of legislative matter are being added to the income tax laws of the British Isles at intervals of a decade and a half, a rate of expansion which may be regarded as the real deterrent to unification of the extant legislation, since to a large extent the resulting achievement is less one of consolidation than of aggregation. The Income Tax Codification Committee which sat from 1927 to 1936 seems to have felt that a losing battle was being fought, for they drew attention to the quantity of new law that had sprung up and declared that such benefit as was conferred by the consolidating Act of 1918 had to a large extent been lost even at that date (Cmd 5131).

One objection to consolidation lies in the consequent disappearance of well-known section numbers – landmarks, familiarity with which is of considerable practical importance to those concerned with day-to-day administration; the Royal Commission recommended a system which would allow additions to be incorporated in the consolidating statute without altering the numbering of the basic sections. This device may be met with in the tax legislation of the Indian subcontinent but the proliferation of subsections strains the capacity of alphabetical and numerical classification and perhaps only a borrowing of the Dewey decimal system from the libraries would seem to offer a path through the maze of increasing internal complexity. The 1952 Act indeed showed a flash of inspiration when section 34 of the 1918 Act (a notable loss relief section) was transmuted into number 341 of the 1952 Act. On balance, however, it seems impracticable to seek to contain the new wine in old bottles and the most that can be hoped for is the retention of the existing pattern of classification by subject-matter in parts and sub-parts (termed chapters). For clarity of reference in this context we propose to use arabic numerals when referring to the text of the Irish Bill while roman numerals will be retained in respect of the Income Tax Act, 1952.

We do not know if it is by accident or design that the Irish measure commences where the British Act left off, for Part 1 opens up with the interpretation of certain expressions which are found at the end of the 1952 Act. Having perhaps avoided a charge of undue deference to the British model, the new Bill is content to follow on in similar terms, and logically enough the first part deals with the imposition of income tax generally. The routine matters which appear in the next part of the British Act are sensibly postponed by the Irish to Part 7 (administrative personnel), Part 8 (returns and assessments), and Part 26 (appeals). There is, however, scope for improvement on the simplified lines of the Income Tax Management Act, 1964.

The consolidation measures on both sides of the Irish Sea give early consideration to the five schedules which in the 1918 Act were relegated to an appendix. The pattern of the legislation is broadly similar, although the preceding-year basis has been retained for Schedule E in certain instances, a modification which could be followed with advantage in relation to, say, remuneration of controlling directors voted by reference to results.

Cases 3, 4 and 5 of Schedule D have been amalgamated in the Republic under Case 3 and as a basic principle it is the general rule that all Case 3 items are to be deemed to issue from a 'single source'. The significance of the distinction between the British Cases III, IV and V originally lay in a similar principle of aggregation of items comprised in specified sub-groups, of which illustrations may be found in such cases as Diggines v. Forestal Land, Timber & Railways Co Ltd (9 A.T.C. 490; 15 T.C. 630). However, changes in the United Kingdom have brought about the position where each source is separately dealt with in any event and, having regard to the important distinction which remains between the 'remittance' and the 'arising' basis, there seems little purpose in the continued segregation of these cases on the existing pattern.

In this connection it is not apparent why either country has thought fit to retain the distinction between Cases I and II of Schedule D, which for all practical purposes are the same. However, the irritating reiteration of 'trade, profession or vocation' in the British legislation has been modified by the Irish definition of 'profession' as including 'vocation'.

As regards the 'sweeping-up' case of Schedule D, Case 4 in the Republic occupies the place of Case VI in the United Kingdom. It also incorporates those features of Case VIII which have been adopted from the British system despite the retention of Schedules A and B. It seems to us that the less drastic Irish measures would appeal to those who feel that one set of complications in United Kingdom property matters has been replaced by another. It may be that the transfer of this troublesome subject to the anonymity of Schedule D owes much to Parliamentary criticism of recent years, but in any event we consider that the retention of the scheme of things evolved in the days when Britain's acres were green would have become increasingly inappropriate in our urbanized society.

The Irish Consolidation Bill contains thirty-eight parts as against twenty-six in the 1952 Act, although there are seven schedules less. Some parts contain legislation which has no counterpart in the British system and of these the most interesting are the provisions for relief over three years of expenditure on the training of local staff before commencement of trading (Part 17) and those designed to encourage trades in the national interest (Parts 18, 20 and 25). Another encouragement to new developments arises from the retention of the right to set off losses in one trade against profits from another, a rule which was abolished in the United Kingdom in 1960.

Again, a provision which contrasts favourably with its opposite number in the United Kingdom is that relating to bank deposit interest. The limit of income in the Republic is £25 in place of £15 in the United Kingdom and the scheme is not restricted to the small savings media of the Post Office and trustee savings banks, but extends also to the major commercial banks. Other parts represent legislation recognizably inspired by recent British precedents. Thus terminal loss relief and subvention payments are to be found in Part 19 along with the rules for increasing loss claims by reference to capital allowances; retirement and other annuities in Part 12; investment allowances for shipping (14) and relief for dredging expenditure (16); while Parts 23 and 24 reproduce the tax avoidance provisions in respect of dividend-stripping enacted in 1955 and 1959.

The pattern of grouping the legislation evolved for the purpose of the 1952 Act seems to have stood the test of time, viewed against comparable groupings in the new Bill. Familiar features include personal reliefs (Part 6); the rules for special classes of persons (9), special companies (10 and 11) and administration of estates (29); reliefs for outlay on scientific research (14), for losses (19) charities or public bodies (21) and pension arrangements (12); double taxation relief (22) and collection matters (33).

Perhaps a retrograde step in the Irish Bill is the dispersal over several parts (27 to 34) of the miscellaneous rules for investment income contained in Part VII of the 1952 Act. We hope that the draftsman of the next United Kingdom consolidation Act will not yield to the temptation towards over-refinement which in the Irish draft has led to the proliferation of parts having little intrinsic importance and sometimes only a single section. As accountants are well aware, the most carefully devised system of classification must in the end admit defeat through the inclusion of a 'sundries' category which in the Income Tax Act, 1952, is neatly contained in Part XXIV. Not all its contents are represented in Irish legislation, and other British provisions with no counterpart are the rules for small maintenance payments under Court orders (VII), those for rationalizing industry (XXIII) and the short-term gains tax introduced in 1962.

We recall that the Parliamentary Estimates Committee (Subcommittee C) which reported on income tax matters in 1961 recommended that the Board of Inland Revenue should, before the end of 1962, re-examine the possibility of decentralizing surtax. However, the terms of the Income Tax Management Act, 1964, do not indicate that implementation of any changes in the existing surtax machinery are likely. The Bill recapitulates the Irish arrangements in Parts 10 (general), 28 (settlements) and 36 (companies).

It is interesting to note the simplified practice whereby assessments are made by the inspector on a current-year basis reminiscent of Case VIII procedure. Moreover, an individual may elect to have P.A.Y.E. operated and collections allocated between income tax and surtax. In the upshot it seems that his surtax matters need consume but a fraction of the attention which they require in the United Kingdom.

Another novel feature involves a departure from the provisions of what is now section 415 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, introduced in 1946 to counteract the decision in Duke of Westminster v. C.I.R. (14 A.T.C. 77; 19 T.C. 490). A valid disposition can be made of income payable to any university or college in the Republic for the purpose of enabling it to carry on research, provided that it is made for a period which can exceed three years – half the period required in the case of a disposition in favour of individuals. It is sufficient that the disposition is effected with the motive of assisting the institution to teach any of the natural sciences and it can be made in favour of a trust fund set up to make such disbursements.

To the outside observer it must appear extraordinary that the whole system of capital allowances elaborated in thousands of words in the Income Tax Acts achieves no more than the spreading of the capital cost of assets over their life in a manner arithmetically distinct to that adopted in accounts, and it may well be asked whether the enormous expenditure of effort involved in maintaining this system is really justified. The free depreciation provisions for development districts introduced by the Finance Act, 1963, which have parallels on the continent of Europe, point the way to an ultimate solution. In the meantime the Republic has hastened but slowly in the direction of British arrangements and we notice, for instance, the retention of the mills, factories allowance for older structures. While the Irish treatment is not significantly different, its consolidated form gives it an appearance of simplicity when compared with the endless ramifications introduced by the spate of amending legislation in the United Kingdom. It seems that a strong case can be made out for the consolidation of that part of the British legislation which concerns capital allowances, and indeed, the future pattern of income tax reform generally might well take the form of periodical repeal and re-enactment of those sections of the earlier legislation which have been extensively amended. The Income Tax Management Act of 1964 was a notable step in this direction but to complete the process it might be necessary to re-publish the 'rump' of the old legislation 'gaps and all', to adapt a Cromwellian saying.

We conclude with a reference to a feature of the United Kingdom system which has come in for some criticism, namely, the absence of arrangements for publishing reports of cases heard before the General or Special Commissioners. At present taxpayers may miss the opportunity to keep open an appeal on a disputed point, pending the settlement of a test case through ignorance of the fact that proceedings have commenced elsewhere; a point of particular significance when viewed against the background of the tremendous delays in Revenue litigation. We recall that the case of Hinton v. Maden & Ireland Ltd (38 A.T.C. 231; 38 T.C. 391) ushered in developments in the field of investment allowances which proved of the widest significance to taxpayers and it seems contrary to equity that the public should remain ignorant of the point at issue in such a case. We note with interest, therefore, that section 412 of the Irish Bill, reproducing an enactment of 1949, allows the publication of proceedings held in camera in the official law reports subject to the suppression of the identity of the party concerned.

It is sometimes suggested that wider publicity in the United Kingdom might deter taxpayers from going before the Commissioners but this contention does not appear valid when it is considered that all particulars are at risk of disclosure if a case is required to be stated for the opinion of the High Court. We see no reason why selected decisions should not be published in the manner sanctioned in the Republic where the point raised is likely to be of general interest and, indeed, their timely publication could be expected to reduce duplication of proceedings on the same topic initiated independently.

Another Look at Final Accounts

by F. NICHOLLS, A.A.C.C.A.

ONE of the elementary distinctions in accounting is the difference between personal and impersonal accounts. Every student becomes familiar with it and every accounting system, however complex, must deal with it. This is not surprising because it is only through the personal accounts that money flows into or out of the business, apart from capital which is, in any case, the personal accounts of the shareholders. The impersonal accounts tell you what you did with the money you spent or what you did for the money you received.

This distinction is most important, yet in the annual and other periodic accounting summaries no such distinction is made. The balance sheet is a jumble of personal and impersonal accounts; the profit and loss account includes only some of the impersonal accounts, the remainder being lost in the balance sheet. Because of this confusion only half the story is told.

It is essential to know whether a profit or loss was made, but either of these is lost in the total income and expenditure. It is just as essential to know whether income exceeded expenditure or expenditure exceeded income. In the long run they must balance; if they do not, the result is bankruptcy on the one hand, or unemployed capital on the other.

Income and Assets

The personal accounts and cash reflect the income and expenditure of the business; the impersonal accounts show the profit or loss and the change in physical assets. The personal accounts express the financing of the business; the impersonal accounts reveal the producing and trading operations.

Producing and distributing goods or providing a service is done by people using physical assets. You cannot do anything with a liability except pay it, and all you can do with a debtor is to dun him. It seems reasonable, therefore, to measure the producing and distributing or servicing side of the business separately from the financing side. It is also reasonable to measure performance as a whole and not only the profit aspect of performance. Separating physical assets into balance sheet and profit and loss account items is unrealistic and can only result in a distorted or incomplete picture.

The traditional balance sheet can be rearranged to show the personal and impersonal sides of the business; or, more appropriately, the financing and operating aspects:

BALANCE SHEET

Finance	Operations
Capital and Reserves	Fixed Assets
plus Creditors	plus Stocks less Debtors less Cash

Any increase in finance must be equalled by an increase in operating assets. Any such increase can only be obtained if the income includes either profit or new capital or if the excess expenditure comes from a reduction in the cash balance or a decrease in the net external debt (debtors less creditors), as follows:

	(1)	(2)	(3)
Capital	1,000	1,000	1,000
Profit	—	100	—
Deduct:
Net external debt	200	200	150
	800	900	850
Deduct:
Cash	100	100	50
Net Investment	700	800	800
Operating Assets	700	800	800

If the business has a net external credit (creditors less debtors) then an increase in net external credit has the same effect as a decrease in net external debt.

A decrease in operating assets will result from an operating loss, an increase in the net external debt or an increase in cash. The last mentioned item may seem to be a matter for congratulation but this is not so if it arises from a decrease in operating assets other than the realization of surplus operating assets such as the disposal of excessive stocks. The maintenance and growth of a business is related to the maintenance and growth of the operating assets.

An increase in operating assets is not of itself a good thing. Two things must be taken into account: how the increase was financed; and whether the increase was in proportion to the use of the assets.

If the increase in operating assets is greater than the retained profit, then expenditure has exceeded income. It has been financed by a decrease in cash or a decrease in the net external debt, or correspondingly an increase in the net external credit. Any excess expenditure other than from surplus cash must be covered in the near future by more retained profit or new capital or long-term credit. The financial difficulties involved in over-spending are too obvious to need emphasizing. What is needed is to make the over-spending more obvious more quickly. More frequent accounts and a separation of the financing data from the operating data should help.

The Use of Assets

The second point to be taken into account is the relationship between the value of the operating assets and their use. Knowing only the value of the asset, or even knowing the change in the value of the asset in the accounting period, is not enough. It is important to know whether the change was justified in relation to the use. This is especially so in the case of stocks. It should not be overlooked in the case of long-term assets, particularly plant and vehicles, because any change in the ratio of write-off and maintenance to asset value will affect financing requirements in the future.

It is, perhaps, an accident of history that accounting has concerned itself more with balances than with the use of assets; yet business is the use of assets. The value of an asset at the end of the accounting period only has meaning in relation to the input and output of the asset and of the business as a whole during the period. Input is purchases and labour; output is the assets and labour which have gone into sales. Accounts showing input and output are more informative than accounts showing balances. They establish relationships which should raise questions.

If from such an account we deduct sales value we can show both the income and expenditure and the profit or loss, as shown below.

Expenditure has exceeded income by one hundred and sales value has exceeded total cost of sales resulting in a profit of 300. Excess

	Balance	+	Input	—	Output	=	Balance
Fixed assets	1,000	+	200	—	100	=	1,100
Labour		+	600	—	600
Stocks, etc.	500	+	5,000	—	4,700	=	800
	1,500	+	5,800	—	5,400	=	1,900
Sales		—	5,700	+	5,700
Surplus of expenditure			100

expenditure and profit together produced an increase in operating assets of 400.

A financial statement showing the change in the financing for the period would show how the excess expenditure was financed. The net credit, including capital, and cash of the business would, of course, equal the total of the operating assets.

Input-output Accounts

To produce input-output accounts showing the operations of the business and a financial statement in similar form showing the financing of the business would be something of a radical departure from the traditional balance sheet and profit and loss account. They would not be simpler statements but they would be more informative. They would highlight income and expenditure as well as profit or loss. They would bring out the relationship between the value and use of assets and draw attention to any adverse trends, particularly in stockholding. They would highlight not only the selling but also the buying, which keeps the business going. The whole of the operations, not just the profit earning aspect of operations, would be complete in one statement. They would show the source of additional finance in the period or where the loss of finance occurred.

The short-comings of the balance sheet find frequent mention. The title expresses what it is and reveals its inadequacy. Business is movement, not a balance. Input-output accounts are an attempt to express movement.

Profit making is only one of the essential features of business. Keeping solvent is another. The proper use of assets is another. All should be obvious from the final accounts presented to management.

THE ACCOUNTING WORLD

The Accountancy Profession in Spain

Under the New Spanish Development Plan

by FERNANDO TANARRO
Profesor Intendente Mercantil Colegiado

PAST and present problems confronting the accountancy profession in Spain have previously been considered and brought to the knowledge of readers of The Accountant.[1] The conclusion then reached was that the development of the profession in Spain had been retarded for two reasons: (1) the business community in Spain as a whole had little need for the services of professional accountants as auditors; (2) the training of accountants was not on a sufficiently high level.

However, in addition to the above reasons, there are some other facts which should be emphasized in assessing the accuracy of this conclusion, as they have an important bearing on the subject.

Family Companies

The Spanish capitalist system was based for many years upon the existence of a large number of small family companies. When some of these became incorporated and their capital substantially increased, the new share capital was still shared by the same few family founders. As a rule no change of outlook was forthcoming to meet the new economic structure.

On the other hand, the absence of the principle of economic freedom, because of the isolated position of the country and a strong protective policy which had been in force for many years, gave small companies a privileged position in the narrow framework of the national market. This policy prevented any noticeable fluctuation in the number of new businesses or in failing businesses and prolonged the survival of unsuccessful concerns, which largely obviated any additional need for the services of professional accountants as auditors.

Obviously, in such a state of affairs, the development of the profession in Spain could not find the atmosphere favourable for its awaited progress. The professional level of accountants was conditioned to the requirements of the demand. Future improvements would have to be accompanied by a complete change in the national economic policy.

Fortunately this change came about during the past year. As a result of the suggestions contained in the report on the economic development of Spain issued by the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development in August 1962, the four-year Spanish Development Plan was put in force as from January 1964.

Article 25 of the Development Plan states that the Government will give its assistance to small companies if they become associated with some financial or productive system. Special consideration will also be given to professional advisory groups involved in promoting such associations. It should be emphasized that during the First International Congress on Investment held in Barcelona last October, the Minister of Finance expressed satisfaction with the general performance of chartered accountants and auditors as a whole and his opinion that Spanish accountants must rapidly achieve a similar position.

Principal Reforms

Some of the principal reforms and important items of Spanish legislation affecting accountancy matters, which became operative in 1964 are as follows:

(a) The law of the Regularization of Accounts which requires companies to make adequate reserves for the replacement of assets and to bring into their official books assets hitherto concealed. As a result 7,000 firms took the decision to adjust their balance sheets. This represents approximately 20 per cent of the total number of firms and roughly 70 per cent of all joint stock companies.

(b) A new Investment Companies Act, which states that the annual balance sheet and profit and loss account of the companies under this regulation must be certified by two practising members of the Instituto de Censores Jurados de Cuentas. These censores (auditors) have to be appointed by the shareholders in general meeting and by the Instituto de Credito a Medio y Largo Plazo (Institute for Medium and Long-term Credit) as the acting organization of the National Stock Exchange.

(c) The General Tributary Reform Law – dated December 28th, 1963, which created the revolutionary concept of requiring accountancy supervision in agriculture. As a result even agricultural undertakings in under-developed areas must request each year to be assessed for tax either on an individual or a global basis. The former means that the company is taxed on the results as shown by the books of account, even if they are maintained on a cash basis. Under the global system, an overall assessment is made on the industry as a whole in certain areas, the total being borne proportionately by the number of companies in each area. The allocation is made according to the size of the companies, taking into account sales turnover, number of employees and other statistics. Under this method no inspection is made by the authorities; the amount of the global assessment is determined by a committee composed of tax authorities and contributors. Any claim against global assessment allocation must be exercised through accounting records.

All these factors are producing a growing demand for the advice and services of professional accountants. Considerable interest is being displayed nowadays by the local authorities and major development plans for the accountancy profession are being intelligently considered. It is the general feeling at the beginning of 1965 that – despite the great lack of knowledge and understanding on the part of large segments of business public as to the nature of auditing work, its functions, and how it affects the entire pattern of the business community – the first improvements since 1951 when The Spanish Companies Act marked a new era, are being made and that these should be continued and accelerated in order to bring the national level of accounting standards into line with modern needs.

FRANCE

Taxation Reform

LAST week the French Council of Ministers approved a number of striking proposals in the taxation field, prepared by M Giscard d'Estaing, the Finance Minister, with a view to the encouragement of the investment of private savings. The proposals are estimated to cost 115 million francs this year, 506 million francs next year, and another decline of 108 million francs in 1967. The effective rate of total tax on distributed company profits will be reduced from 67·5 per cent to 51·2 per cent in 1967. Profits tax will remain at 50 per cent but an amount corresponding to 25 per cent will be credited against shareholders' personal income tax. How different from the British Government's proposals! The present withholding tax of 24 per cent will be gradually dropped, in favour of residents in France. But non-residents will suffer a withholding tax of 25 per cent.

Profits tax on capital gains realized in a merger will be spread over ten years. Even where there is no merger, the tax on capital gains from the sale of company assets will be reduced from 50 per cent to 10 per cent payable over five years, provided that the company owned the asset for more than two years. To encourage mergers, even with companies outside France, further tax concessions are proposed. The present stamp duty of ½ per cent on the capital of the acquired company will be replaced by a flat rate tax of 50 francs.

French companies are to publish more information, including quarterly turnover figures, analysed between branches of activity. Holding companies will have to show in their accounts the profits of subsidiaries. Overhead expenses which have not qualified for deduction for tax purposes will have to be shown, as well as the amount of tax paid.

The U.E.C.

IN an introduction to the reports of the various committees of the U.E.C. presented at the Vienna Congress last September, in a recent issue of Economie et Comptabilité, M Jean Wisner, President of the Société des Experts Comptables Français, remarks that the new (British, Dutch and Scandinavian) members of the Union did not seem to be able to co-operate completely in the Congress, partly because the functioning of the U.E.C. depends essentially on the activity of the Permanent Committees, and it was too late for those who joined in 1963 to take their full share of the work.

He reminds readers that the two basic characteristics of the U.E.C. are that it is not a collection of individuals, but of professional organizations; and secondly, that its motive power lies in the work of the Permanent Committees which are international in composition and demonstrate what can be achieved in a spirit of co-operation, despite differences in language, by Europeans who are resolved to carry out a common task. The President of the U.E.C. is in the position of a Federal President, and, perhaps, in this co-operation of professional organizations may be seen a prefiguration of the Europe of tomorrow.

NEW ZEALAND

New Zealand Society's 1965 Convention

THE 1965 National Convention of the New Zealand Society of Accountants was held last month at Christchurch from March 18th to 22nd.

The Convention opened on Thursday afternoon, March 18th, with a panel session on 'The change-over to decimal currency'. The panel was under the chairmanship of Mr J. N. Searle, B.COM., A.R.A.N.Z., Secretary and Chief Executive Officer of the Decimal Currency Board, and the other members were Mr J. I. Martin, A.R.A.N.Z., A.C.I.S., General Manager, Burroughs Ltd, and Mr D. G. Trow, B.COM., A.R.A.N.Z., A.C.I.S., a partner in the firm of Wilberfoss, Harden, Daniel & Co. Among the matters discussed were the reasons for the conversion to decimal currency, the effect on office and accounting procedures, and the problems of machine conversion. It was felt that the advantages to be gained from decimalization would make the change-over well worth while as there would be substantial time savings resulting from simpler calculations and better accuracy of work, while at the same time decimalization would make a wider range of office machines available.

At other sessions of the Convention, interesting papers were presented on 'Management looks at the accountant'; 'Farm management accounting'; 'The valuation of unquoted shares', and 'The economic and social effects of mergers and take-overs in New Zealand'.

Capital Gains in Shares

A SURVEY conducted recently by a New Zealand investment research unit shows that, between April 1957 and December 1964, the share values of two public companies in New Zealand increased by more than 400 per cent, while those of eighteen other companies rose between 200 to 400 per cent. The greatest percentage capital gain – 457 per cent – was recorded by the shares of a meat freezing firm. Generally, the shares of companies manufacturing consumer and industrial goods made the biggest advances, although two major newspaper publishing organizations, with increases of 241 and 208 per cent, were also among the leaders.

In calculating capital gains from 1957 to 1964, the research unit assumed that a basic investment of £100 was made at April 30th, 1957, that cash issues were taken up in full and bonus shares were retained. Within their overall figures, several companies also experienced very substantial gains during the twelve months ended December 1964. For this period alone, the share values of twenty-three companies, adjusted for capital changes, increased by 40 per cent or more, the largest – 95 per cent – being attained by a rubber distributing firm.

AUSTRALIA

Third Chartered Accountants' Congress

THE Third Congress to be held by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Australia is to take place in Adelaide this year from May 31st to June 4th. The Congress will provide an opportunity for members of the Institute to review professional standards through the discussion and study of new techniques and the re-appraisal of certain old techniques now found wanting, and enable them to consider the various problems facing the profession as a result of the increasing complexities and development of the business community.

The opening ceremony will take place in Bonython Hall, University of Adelaide, on Monday afternoon, May 31st, and the technical sessions will commence the next morning at the Hotel Australia with an address by the President of the Institute, Mr L. A. Braddock, F.C.A. The Presidential address will be followed by introductory comments on the technical sessions by Sir Alexander Fitzgerald, O.B.E., B.COM., F.C.A.

At the first technical session previously circulated papers on 'The purpose of an audit', by Mr J. L. Blacket, A.C.A., and 'The audit of group accounts', by Mr E. H. Burgess, A.U.A., F.C.A., will be considered and discussed. At the second, third and fourth sessions to be held on Wednesday and Thursday the following papers will be considered: 'The impact of electronic data processing on the chartered accountant' (two papers by Mr K. D. Woolmer, B.EC., A.A.S.A., and Mr W. G. Philip, B.COMM., A.C.A.); 'Business efficiency, the part of the practising accountant', by Mr H. M. Kitson, F.C.A.; and 'Accounting – an art or a science?', by Mr A. B. Campbell, B.A., F.C.A.

The Congress will include a comprehensive social programme for members and their ladies, and special events for the ladies are planned to coincide with the business sessions. The social functions will include tours to places of interest in and around Adelaide, a visit to the South Australian National Art Gallery, a reception given by the President of the Institute at the Hotel Australia, a members' dinner and a dinner-dance.

Capital Allowances Today– Are they being Fully Used?

by A. S. ASHTON
Treasurer, Esso Petroleum Co Ltd

ALMOST any capital investment project can be made to show either an excellent or a poor rate of return according to the wishes of the sponsor: for so much depends on the way the return is calculated. I make this somewhat cynical statement to emphasize how important it is to decide what is the right method of calculation. The right method is, I submit, one that takes fully into account the effects of the tax system under which we operate. And for industrial companies the capital allowances are now the most significant element in that tax system. If we fail to take these allowances into account when deciding whether or not to proceed with an investment project, then as business men we are probably missing attractive opportunities to benefit our shareholders, and we are certainly failing to use an important instrument of Government policy. May I illustrate this by means of a simple example?

In the accompanying Table 1 we have an investment project. This is a proposal to spend £1,000 – or £1 million, if that is your scale of operations. The project has a seven-year life, and the results are shown year by year. In the books of the company the capital investment is being depreciated by the straight-line method; in other words, the £1,000 is divided by seven – as will be seen in the third column of the table.

For the sake of simplicity I am assuming that the investment consists solely of plant, so that the allowances for tax purposes are: investment 30 per cent, initial 10 per cent, and annual 25 per cent, which for the first year gives a total of 65 per cent. The 25 per cent annual allowance is, of course, on a reducing basis and I am assuming the plant comes into operation just before the beginning of year 1, so that the benefit of the allowance is gained in that year. There is no residual value for this investment: at the end of the seventh year the machinery is worn out and cannot be used any more or sold, so that is the end of the whole thing. I am assuming in this example that taxation is incurred in the form of a corporation tax of 37½ per cent. I do not want it thought that I have any inside information about this; it is simply a guess arrived at on the grounds that 35 per cent is probably too much to hope for and 40 per cent would really be too steep: so I took a mid-point between the two. In any case we may not know the rate, I gather, until April 1966, so it is pretty academic for the time being; but I thought it would be still more academic to take the present system of taxation because that is more or less over now and we must start looking ahead to the new system. The tax, I have assumed, will be payable one year after the liability has been incurred, although in practice it will probably be a bit further ahead; but I want to keep the example as simple as possible.

The substance of a lecture given at a meeting of the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants on February 18th.

Important Assumption

My final assumption, and a very important one indeed, is that this project is being embarked on by a company that is already earning sufficient profits from its other existing activities to enable it to take immediate advantage of the investment allowances created by the project. I am not, therefore, relying on this project to provide sufficient profits to involve a tax liability in the first year that is big enough to enable the company to take advantage of all the allowances generated by the project. This is a very important assumption, and if it is not valid then much of the rest of my argument does not apply; but it is a valid assumption, I submit, for most existing businesses.

In the table it will be seen that I show trading profits of somewhere around £150 to £200 a year. I have not shown any great variation there because I did not want it to be thought that the argument depends upon any extreme case, but I have varied the figures from year to year, because that is germane to the argument. I am showing a trading profit; that is, a profit after paying all the expenses involved in the operation, but before charging depreciation and certainly before any tax liability. So after deducting depreciation we are left with the pre-tax profit shown in the fourth column. Now, straight away, we can calculate a rate of return from these simple figures.

In Table 1, I show the rate of return on first cost and before tax. In this case we simply say, 'We are going to spend £1,000. We are going to make profits in, say, the second year of £77, and therefore the rate of return on this project is 7·7 per cent'. Believe me, this method is used very frequently, and it shows how important it is to select the right year! Of course, somebody might say, 'Well, I do not like the idea of this. Let us set it all out and see the return year by year', or someone else might ask, 'What's the average rate of return?' In this case the project has an average rate of return of 4·8 per cent.

Now this is not a very exciting rate of return; but notice that we have siphoned off £143 a year for seven years in the form of depreciation charges which, so far as this project is concerned, have simply disappeared. The rate of return has been calculated throughout the life of the project on the original £1,000 – and when we get near the end, after we have had most of our £1,000 back, we are still saying we are only getting a rate of return at these low figures. It does not require much sophistication to argue that this is not fair to the project, and that what ought to be done is to write down the capital cost year by year by the amount of the depreciation. So we come to Table 2.

BOOK RATE OF RETURN

Year	Pre-tax profit	Tax	Net profit	Book value mid-year	Rate of return per cent
1	37	(176)	213	928	23·0
2	77	21	56	785	7·1
3	47	26	21	642	3·3
4	42	35	7	499	1·4
5	57	49	8	356	2·2
6	57	56	1	213	0·5
7	17	2	15	72	20·8
				Weighted average	9·2

Here we have the same project looked at in a more sophisticated way. We start off with the pre-tax profits – the same figures used in column four of Table 1. Now, I propose to bring tax into the picture, and this time show the calculation of an after-tax return. The tax liability is shown in the third column. This liability implies a 37½ per cent deduction from the pre-tax profits, adjusted to allow for the fact that the depreciation allowance for tax calculation purposes is, of course, different from the depreciation rate used in the company's books. Immediately the tremendous effect can be seen on the rate of return in the first year because investment and initial allowances play such a big part in that year.

You will see that I have run down the amount of capital 'left in the project' from the original £1,000 to nothing, over the seven years, and have shown the book value at each mid-year so that the calculation comes out nice and tidily. You will see that I am calculating the rate of return as the net profit after tax expressed as a percentage of the book value of the investment and, here again, we have a nice selection of returns to choose from. I do not think anybody would really have the nerve to claim this project has a return of 23 per cent simply because that is the return in the first year, but I think they would be rather hard put to it to select any single year as being particularly representative or defensible.

Of course, it is reasonable to average the book return over the period of life of the project. In the first case I have simply taken the arithmetical average of these annual percentages to give a return of 8·3 per cent. If you have a project which maintains its net profit well to the last, you can work up some very good returns in the later years and these can bring up the average very considerably because the rates are calculated against a relatively small capital base. Of course, it is much more sound to use a weighted average – weighted, that is, by the amount of capital left in the project each year. Or another way of looking at it – just add up all the figures in the net profit column and all the figures in the book value column and take one as a percentage of the other, and you get in this case 9·2 per cent for this project.

It will be seen that here there is an after-tax rate of return that is just about double the pre-tax rate of return. This emphasizes how important it is to know what kind of a rate of return we are dealing in; and it also emphasizes how important it is to take into account the capital allowances that make such an important contribution to the profitability of the project.

Discounted Cash Flow

Now let us go further and come to discounted cash flow (D.C.F.). I propose to work through the D.C.F. calculation on this particular project by reference to Tables 3 and 4. In Table 3, column 2, we start with the same trading profit figures we used in Table 1. We take no account of depreciation because we are now dealing with cash, not book figures. Then, in column 3, I show the tax liability before taking account of the allowances. This is just 37½ per cent of the profit, but it is all stepped down by one year: for example, in year 2 we pay the taxes incurred in year 1 and so on down the line; and now it will be seen that we have to bring in year 8 because we are, in fact, still paying tax a year after the project has ended. We make this deferment of a year, of course, to reflect as accurately as we can exactly when we pay out the cash.

Then we have to take into account the tax that is saved to the company by the allowances generated by this particular project, and this is shown in column 4. You will see that in year 1 we show £244: this is 37½ per cent of £650 (£650 being 30%+10%+25% of the £1,000 which was spent in year zero, the year before the table starts) and as it was incurred in year zero, the allowances become applicable in the following year, year 1: this is the year when cash would have left the company to this extent had it not been for these allowances. (You will recall that I am assuming the company is incurring tax elsewhere which can be saved by virtue of embarking on this project.) So, in terms of cash flow, we show tax saved by allowances and we net this off against the other columns, and end up with the net cash flow for each year. You will note that because of the tax allowances there is a very big cash flow in the first two years of the project, while in the eighth and last year there is a negative flow because taxes have to be paid after the project has ceased to produce any inflow.

Principal and Interest Method

Now let us turn to Table 4, which starts from where we left off in Table 3 with the net cash flow in the second column. The table has been drawn up to show what would happen, on the assumption that the project is financed entirely by means of a bank overdraft, and this bank overdraft is only used for this particular project. The overdraft is for £1,000, and this sum is spent in year zero. Then the account is credited year by year with all the cash that flows in as a result of the project, and out of the proceeds 10 per cent is paid on the outstanding balance of the overdraft each year. For example, in the first year £424 comes in; interest of £100 is paid, which is 10 per cent on the original £1,000 outstanding in year zero. (I am assuming annual payments to keep this simple.) This means that £324 is left out of the £424, which is used to reduce the balance outstanding to £676. The next year £214 comes in; the interest paid is £68 because that is 10 per cent of the £676 outstanding in the previous year. That leaves £146 to repay principal, and so the balance outstanding is brought down to £530. Continuing in this way, at the end of the eighth year we come out all square. By then, out of the proceeds generated by the project, we have recovered our original investment of £1,000, and we have paid 10 per cent interest on the amount outstanding each year; or, as it is sometimes put, on the amount 'at risk'. Having played around with this example, I knew that in fact a percentage of 10 per cent interest would serve to bring this out all square at the end, but there is no way of finding this out except by trial and error or by using a computer.

If we were starting from scratch with this cash flow, we would simply start with what looked a likely interest figure and try it out. If we took 5 per cent and worked this through, charging 5 per cent interest, a surplus would be left at the end, so clearly 5 per cent would be too low; we might then try, say, 15 per cent but this would result in a deficit and it would be clear this figure was too high. We would then go on by trial and error like this until we found the right figure; or we could use a computer and so get the answer straight away.

This 10 per cent 'interest' figure is, of course, the discounted cash flow rate of return on this project. (Yet another rate of return!) I always like saying 'of course' at this stage in the discussion because very often people coming to hear a talk about D.C.F. tend to imagine that something very difficult and complicated is coming: all that stuff about discount tables and so on. But really the D.C.F. rate of return is a very simple concept. It merely describes the return being earned on that portion of the money spent that has not yet come back: and that is surely what matters to the business man. That is what the rate of return should be calculated on: not on the first cost, because money is coming back all the time; and not, I submit, on the book value of the investment because that depends on a convention that you have established beforehand that bears no necessary relation to the actual rate at which the cash comes back. Why not take what is really the simpler approach and calculate the rate of return on the amount of money that is out at risk? After all, this is the procedure we are used to (in reverse) when we pay interest on a bank overdraft, or a mortgage loan on a house.

It is true that to have to go through the kind of calculation I have just outlined can be cumbersome and time-consuming: and that is why it is more usual to employ discount tables to discount the cash flow in order to discover the D.C.F. rate of return, which saves quite a lot of time and trouble. But all this sophistication of technique should not be allowed to obscure the true meaning of what we are doing: we are simply trying to estimate the rate of return on the amount of money that is out at risk. And this, I submit, is the return that really matters. It is this return that can justly be compared with the average cost of capital to the company. (In the example above, where for simplicity we assumed the project was entirely financed by means of a bank overdraft, the cost of capital was the rate of interest paid on the outstanding balance of the overdraft; be it noted that the interest was not paid on the total amount of the original loan; nor on a balance reducing annually by some predetermined conventional formula.) In the last resort, it is this return that is of interest to the person who is investing in a company.

The Time Element

The great virtue of this approach is that it gives due weight to the timing of the cash payments and receipts: thus a project that causes a big inflow of funds early in its life will tend to have a high rate of return, because the amount at risk is quickly reduced; whereas a project that takes a long time to get going will tend to have a lower rate of return, because the amount at risk stays high. All this is just another way of saying that money now is worth more than money in the future.

I have always felt that Oscar Hobson made a very useful and profound remark when he said 'money has two dimensions, quantity and time'. Now, when you hear it stated like that, it seems very obvious; but I think that in practice we often tend to forget the time dimension – or at any rate we attach insufficient importance to it because we become hypnotized by quantity.

The proper consideration of the time dimension of money can produce some spectacular results. If you invest £10 at 5 per cent per annum and re-invest the interest, it becomes £20 in fourteen years, and no less than £500 in a normal lifetime. And I have worked out that if anybody had been thoughtful enough to invest £10 in the year 1516 at 5 per cent cumulative, the proceeds would today pay off the National Debt of £30,000 million! We really must bring time properly into the picture. And this, I feel, is what we are not doing sufficiently if we use the earlier methods of calculating rates of return, such as the return on first cost, or the return on book value. The only way of calculating a rate of return that really gives true value for the time element is the D.C.F. method. And this is where the capital allowances play such an important part: for they represent a big inflow of cash to the company right at the beginning of the project's life: and therefore they have a very favourable effect on the rate of return.

Effect of Tax Allowances

An objection has been made to the use of the D.C.F. method on the grounds that it gives far too much importance to what happens in the first few years, and this can be very risky; if you happen to be wrong in your estimates for these early years – and often you may be – the whole project may well prove to have been a mistake. I do not believe this argument invalidates the use of D.C.F., but there is clearly something in it, and anyone using the method must look very carefully at the 'profile' of the investment in relation to the risks involved. But the point I really want to make here is that of all the elements that help to make an investment project attractive, tax allowances are among the least risky. (This is true even in the present state of confusion over the taxation of company profits.) For if we bear in mind the old adage that there is nothing (apart from death) more certain than taxation, this must also apply (given good professional advisers) to tax allowances: and so the receipt of substantial tax allowances early in the life of a project not only boosts the D.C.F. rate of return, it also greatly reduces the risk attached to the project.

The Richardson Committee on Turnover Taxation, whose report was published in March 1964, questioned seventeen witnesses from large companies. The witnesses were asked specifically whether, in judging investment projects, they looked at the net return after payment of tax which the investment was expected to produce. Three witnesses said they looked principally at the return after payment of tax – three out of seventeen! The remainder said they looked principally at the return before payment of tax, although some of these said they had begun to look at the return after payment of tax, but said they regarded this largely in the nature of a second look. The main reason for looking at the before tax return, they said, was that in making investment decisions it was necessary to look ahead over a period of years. And since it was impossible to forecast tax changes, it was better to leave this element of uncertainty out of the calculation.

The Business Man's Function

Well, frankly, this seems to me to be an abrogation of a business man's function. Every look ahead, every investment project, is based on a whole mass of uncertainties. What is going to happen to the price of the product? What is going to happen to wages? What is going to happen with respect to inventions, the obsolescence of existing equipment, public taste, political factors? The business man is the man who is expected to take account of all these factors which it often seems impossible to assess. But this is what we are paid for: it is the whole point of being an entrepreneur, and it is on us that the shareholders rely. It is they, of course, who ultimately take the risk but it is we who must take the decisions. And to single out one factor – taxation – to be ignored just because it is uncertain, seems to me to be quite illogical and ostrich-like.

Having said that, I admit there are great difficulties in forecasting tax changes, and one could hardly choose a more appropriate time than the present to make the point. That is why I stuck my neck out at the beginning of this talk with my 37½ per cent corporation tax – so that you could not accuse me of not practising what I preach!

I should like to end by putting my remarks into the larger context of our national need. Capital investment is a very urgent national issue at present. With a growth rate of 2½–3 per cent in its economy, Britain is not growing fast enough, nor is efficiency improving fast enough. Growth, of course, depends to a large extent on investment – not entirely, but to a large extent – and we invest only 15 per cent of our gross domestic product in this country, taking the figures over a fairly long period. In the other Western European countries, where the growth rates range from 3–7 per cent, they are investing anything from 16–22 per cent of their gross domestic product. There is clearly some element of cause and effect in these figures. And the urgent need to remain competitive with other countries makes an increase in efficiency imperative: this, too, involves more and wiser capital investment.

All this makes it very important that we give great attention to the methods used to analyse and evaluate capital investment projects. The subject is, indeed, attracting increasing interest in official quarters, and the excellent pamphlet, Investment Appraisal, published recently by the National Economic Development Council, is a case in point. But all the analysis in the world will not help us if we deliberately choose to ignore large areas of the situation confronting us: and one large and important area is undoubtedly the tax system within which we have to operate.

LUMP-SUM SUB-AGENCY FEE TAXABLE

THE High Court has accepted an argument by the Inland Revenue that when a company granted a sub-agency for a lump sum of £12,500 it thereby acquired a trading receipt which had to be brought into the computation of its profit for tax purposes (Fleming v. Bellow Machine Co Ltd). The company was a manufacturer of sewing machines, a distributor of other sewing machines, and the proprietor of a foundry. For the purposes of litigation the Court treated each of the three as a separate business – presumably on facts found by the General Commissioners who had allowed the company's appeal.

At the end of 1958 the company had a number of agencies, including an exclusive agency from G. M. Pfaff, A.G., which it had built up from small beginnings in 1947. This agency was first committed to a formal written agreement in 1959 and accounted for about 85 per cent of the total agency business. In 1960 the company took £12,500 from Wilson & Gibbs Ltd for a Pfaff sub-agency. The General Commissioners held it was a capital receipt but the Revenue have successfully appealed.

Mr Justice Pennycuick observed, as reported in The Times of March 25th, that the company's agreement with Pfaff did not relate to the whole structure of its agency business, so that the case was distinguishable from Van den Berghs Ltd v. Clark (14 A.T.C. 62). Even if the Pfaff agency had been surrendered or destroyed it would not have destroyed or materially crippled the company's profit-making apparatus. In any event, the Revenue were right in saying that the grant of a sub-agency was merely the exploitation of a profit-making asset.

If that is decisive, one wonders what was the point of enacting sections 17–18 of the Finance Act, 1964.

EARNINGS OF ADMINISTRATIVE AND CLERICAL EMPLOYEES

ONE of the most interesting items of information published by the Ministry of Labour – at least from the point of view of office staffs – is the annual analysis of earnings of administrative, technical and clerical employees. The March 1965 issue of the Ministry of Labour Gazette gives the result of the October 1964 inquiry which shows that average earnings of male employees in these classes were the equivalent of £23 11*s* 7*d* per week in the last week of October 1964. The inquiry covers all manufacturing industries, together with mining and quarrying, construction and gas, water and electricity. A year earlier, the figure was some 6·7 per cent lower, and five years earlier, 30 per cent below the 1964 figure. Female employees in these classes received, on average, £9 14*s* 7*d* per week; this represents an increase of 6½ per cent on the October 1963 figure and 28 per cent on that of October 1959.

By way of comparison with average weekly earnings of manual workers, reference has been made to the February 1965 issue of the Gazette. Average pay is shown as £18 13*s* 4*d* for men in October 1964, compared with £17 5*s* 9*d* in October 1963 and £14 4*s* 3*d* in October 1959. The percentage increase over a year ago represented by these figures is 8 per cent. The five-year increase is just over 31 per cent. The general tendency for salaries and wages to increase at roughly the same rates, at least in the long-term, is confirmed by these analyses.

FAMILY EXPENDITURE SURVEY

AN inquiry related to the annual earnings analyses, but on a much wider scale, is the annual Family Expenditure Survey (H.M.S.O., price 15*s*). The 1963 edition has now been published and the results, derived from a sample inquiry over some five thousand households, confirm the higher earnings figures indicated by the earnings analyses.

The average family incomes in 1963 were £22 8*s* compared with £20 12*s* 6*d* in 1962, an increase of 6¾ per cent. However, wages and salaries made up only 75 per cent of total family income in the sample considered; other sources of income included self-employment, income from investments, pensions and other State benefits. The average family consisted of 3·02 persons, of which 1·35 were reported as working.

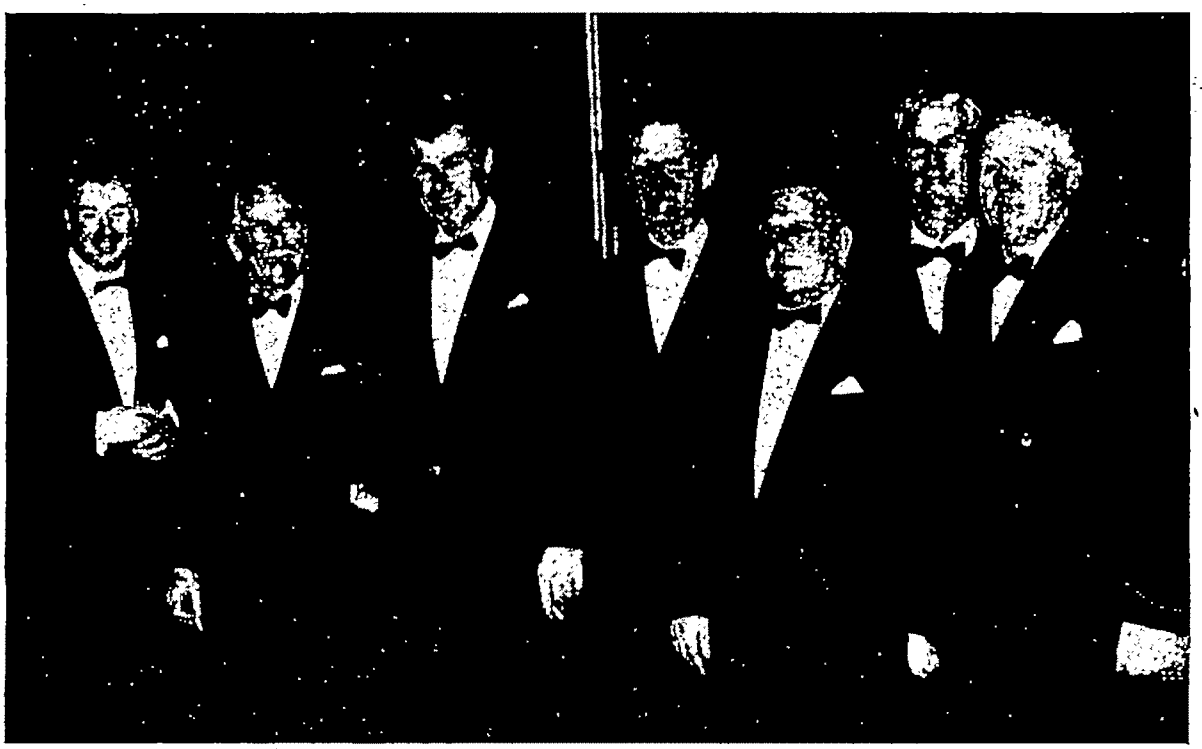
Average spending in 1963 was £19 2*s* 10*d*, or seven-eighths of family income, leaving one-eighth for direct taxation and savings. Food was the most important item of expenditure, making up 29 per cent of family expenditure. Alcoholic drinks made up nearly 4 per cent, and tobacco, 5½ per cent. Family surveys invariably understate these proportions, however. After food, transport and vehicles (12 per cent) and housing, including rates (10½ per cent), were the next most important items of expenditure.

ACCOUNTANT GOLFERS' DINNER

THE Chartered Accountants' Golfing Society held a dinner in The Tallow Chandlers' Hall, London, on Friday of last week. Mr Donald V. House, F.C.A., President of the Society, was in the chair, the principal guest being Mr John Jacobs, the well-known Ryder Cup player.

There were no formal speeches but in welcoming the members and guests the President announced that Mr Jacobs had consented to become the Society's Honorary Professional.

At the conclusion of the dinner, a new golf instruction film, 'Golf for all', was shown.



HIGHER POSTAL CHARGES

THE Postmaster-General announced higher postal charges in the House of Commons last week to come into operation on May 17th, 1965. His latest assessment of the short fall of postal revenue below target level is £32 million by the end of March 1965, £64 million by March 1966 and about £150 million by March 1968.

As a long-term measure a firm of American management consultants has been retained to examine the problem of the productivity and profitability of the postal services. Such steps cannot, however, yield any return in the immediate future. The Government has therefore decided to close the gap to the extent of £37 million in a full year by higher postal charges.

The main change will be an increase in the minimum charge for inland letters to 4*d*. The first weight step in future will be two ounces which will reduce the cost of the two ounce letter by ½*d*. This will yield £21 million in a full year. Other increases will affect inland postcards, printed papers and samples, newspapers, parcels and express service. Commonwealth rates will be brought into line but, as a gesture to exporters, overseas rates in general will not be raised.

Urgent as the short-term problem may be, the long-term one is hardly less so. Until it is solved the public is likely to be faced with the prospect of continually rising charges and a continually deteriorating service. This round of increases has not bought time even until March 1966.

INTERNATIONAL INVESTMENT DISPUTES

THE draft of a new agreement for settling investment disputes has been sent to the members of the World Bank. In a report accompanying the draft, the executive directors of the Bank say that in their opinion adherence to the convention by a country would provide additional inducement for international investment in its territories.

The convention has been drafted in a form which, it is hoped, will not offend the susceptibilities of developing countries. If member countries ratify the proposals an international centre for the settlement of investment disputes will be set up. It will make available facilities to which contracting States and foreign investors will have access on a voluntary basis. Conciliators and arbitrators will be available from a panel.

Recourse to the services of the Centre will be voluntary in the first instance but once a State and a foreign investor have agreed to use its facilities they will be bound to carry out their agreement and consider advice on conciliation or comply with awards given by way of arbitration.

This is My Life . . .

PRINNY, the personnel director, frowned somewhat and whistled a slow and unmelodious trill. 'Of course, I don't like to say that I told you so in the first place,' he remarked. This is a comment that I find particularly annoying. It's bad enough to have your superior say triumphantly that he told you so – a piece of tactlessness which merely lowers him and is therefore rather a compensatory relief – but when he leads off with assumed magnanimity, as Prinny had just done, it's thoroughly exasperating. The more so as he was 100 per cent correct.

I was about to even the score by saying that we should plan constructive action rather than cry over spilt milk when he forestalled me by urging briskly the need for prompt remedial measures, so I subsided and brooded over my problem.

It had begun when our punched-card supervisor, a steady and reliable 30-year-old accountant, approached me to ask for help for his younger brother who was cashier in a small local store which was going into liquidation. The brother was diligent, able, honourable, with a recently won book-keeping diploma, he pleaded; perhaps a recommendation from us would help him to find a job. As it happened we needed to recruit a middle-level man just then, so I asked the brother to attend for interview.

Prinny wasn't at all keen on the idea. Members of the same family are not advisable in offices, he warned me, illustrating his theory with some of our more painful company memories . . . the havoc when the second-in-command of sales analysis pushed commission credits to his cousin among the travellers; the near-riot when the office manager's sister was summarily jilted by the furniture department buyer, the cold war when . . . anyhow, we had loads of examples.

Strictly separate and far apart departments for relations, if we had to engage them, said Prinny; but he was handicapped in his opposition by having the previous week persuaded me to appoint his niece as number four calculating machine operator. I was keen on picking the aforesaid brother who'd had a rattling good interview, so I pushed my preference rather hard. We finally engaged the brother as our assistant cashier . . . a sadly calamitous choice, as time proved.

Mind you, his performance was excellent. He had all the necessary good qualities. He took responsibility readily, was a glutton for work, and could suggest improvements. It was a pity, when the punched-card supervisor and the chief cashier argued over late lodgement dockets, that the brother got involved too, embroiling them in an altercation which went on and on. Their colleagues took sides . . . I had to do some straight talking to get all the hatchets buried.

Later, rotated to internal audit, the brother fell out with the assistant departmental accountant over proper allocation of lump-sum trade discounts; somehow the punched-card supervisor's report highlighted the A.D.A.'s misinterpretations; and another hot spot developed. More friction; more peacemaking; the incidents snowballed.

In fairness, the friction wasn't really the brother's fault, nor yet the punched-card supervisor's. It was just that their close family tie tended to make them emotionally entangled in one another's problems. My personal problem was that their rather prickly reactions to outsiders were undermining morale; another straight talk was needed to restore harmony. For a while all went well; then came the year-end and the annual salary rises based on performance . . . the brothers received different increases.

The fat was in the fire then. Jealously, overtalkative wives and subconscious rivalry, all contributed to the quarrel. Their recriminations on the vexed subject of merit emoluments were spreading bad feeling . . . Prinny roused himself thoughtfully to ask: 'Do we sack one or both?' When I turned down his suggestion flatly he demanded a satisfactory alternative . . . rotation . . . demotion . . . suspension . . . one last chance or else. . . .? My aim is to salvage their careers, as my bad judgement seemed to have jeopardized them, but definitely there'll be no sacking except as the ultimate last solution.

Finance and Commerce

Granada

THE accounts of Granada Group Ltd, which form this week's reprint, were described by one commentator as 'a model of obscurity'. In an organization covering a dozen different spheres there is obviously a crying need for a break-down of earnings and decidedly more information on depreciation policy as it concerns rental business.

Granada's main profit-earning side is commercial television and one would have thought that some information would have been given on the impact of the television levy beyond the fact that because of the levy, television profits will 'not remain at the exceptionally high level of recent years'.

Such a statement would also seem to suggest a need to show shareholders the earning power of the group's other interests. The Granada TV rental service – Red Arrow – which has been built up from twenty shops to 216 in three years has obviously eaten up capital and the £1,077,170 (against £418,557) written off television sets and future and other equipment on rental suggests the pace of development in the year under review.

But all that is said on earnings is that 'our present investment is nearing a point of equilibrium and will in due course return good results'.

No Break-down

In the same context there is Black Arrow Leasing which 'rents office furniture – down to the last ashtray – to business and professional people'. There are, however, no 'down to the last ashtray' figures on the Black Arrow end of the business – in fact no figures at all.

Granada Theatres' 'box-office results were the best for ten years' but the only figure in this context is that a three-year modernization programme has cost over £500,000. Granada Motorway Services looks to be another group development eating capital rather than showing profits. One project is operating on the M1, while another on the M5 should be finished by the end of this year, and it is hoped to open one on the M4 in the summer of 1966.

Granada properties, bowling centres, a group of publishing firms, Granada restaurants, cafés and shops and Granada installations are among other interests of the group. A break-down of earnings and capital employed between commercial television, theatre, rental and leasing, property and other interests is the least that need to be given for a proper appraisal of the group's position.

Control

It should be appreciated that control of the company is with the private holders of £350,000 of ordinary capital. The £3,850,000 of 'A' capital is voteless and shareholders are not even allowed to attend the annual meeting.

In a group which includes a property subsidiary, a property valuation would seem to be a matter worth consideration. The size of the Granada properties subsidiary was increased last year by the acquisition of a controlling interest in Barranquilla Investments Ltd and the acquisition is reflected in the group balance sheet.

The impression is that the Granada board is against property revaluation in so far as what may be termed 'operating properties' are concerned; in the case of theatre properties there may be a case for not revaluing, but over the range of the whole group a revaluation has its worth in assessing the return on true capital employed.

On that point it may be mentioned that the 'Six Year Financial Summary' included with the Granada accounts is simply a summary of profit and loss account and balance sheet figures with no attempt to provide ready information on the return on capital employed, dividend earnings cover or any other investment essentials.

No Effort

There is no indication in the chairman's review with the accounts that there is to be any effort in the future to bring the accounts to the standard required and suggested by the London Stock Exchange Council. One would have expected a company of the size of Granada to have set an example in its accounting and reporting style.

If the 'A' shareholders are not allowed votes or to attend at the annual meetings then at least they should be provided with informative accounts from which they can truly judge the performance of the company. It is only through the 'A' share capital that the public investor has any stake in the concern.

Without a break-down of assets employed in, and profits earned by, the various divisions of the organization, the Granada accounts serve little purpose. The chairman says he sees 'no reason why, in the long run, Granada should be any less prosperous than it has been in the past' but just how prosperous Granada is in present-day terms is exceptionally difficult to judge, if it can be judged at all.

CITY NOTES

STERLING doubts having reached the point where the Treasury considered a routine devaluation denial necessary, the twin uncertainties of pressure on the £ and of doubts about the Budget have continued to plague the stock-market. Earlier this year when sterling was under pressure it was assumed that in March and April the closing of forward positions would lead to recovery. Forward positions, however, are being reopened and the Bank of England is having to support the forward rate.

The pre-Budget rush of new issue activity is over and there must be some doubt as to whether the rush was worth the trouble. In some cases shares already stand below the supposedly 'attractive' basis on which they were originally offered.

Similarly the flood of advance preliminary figures and asset valuations has made little or no impression on stock-market values. Many shares stand at prices below those ruling when profits, dividends and valuations were announced with the intention, presumably, of attempting to establish realistic Budget day prices.

Incorporated Accountants

SIR, – The statement by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales which was published in your issue of March 13th, is very welcome. While I regret that any exceptions remain to the full integration of incorporated accountants, I realize that there were problems in finding a formula compatible with the Council's policy regarding chartered accountants in practice.

As you are aware, we have made representations on several occasions in an attempt to secure the same designation for the present incorporated members as the other members of the Institute. I am writing to place on record our appreciation of the initiative on the part of the Council.

The lead taken by the Council shows recognition of the need for action and, judging by the response from members at the annual meeting last year, I feel sure that the membership will endorse these recommendations at the special meeting on July 14th, 1965.

Yours faithfully,

Ipswich. B. V. PIGGOTT, F.S.A.A.

The Emerging Role of the Profession

SIR, – The last ten years have seen rapid changes in management techniques, such as the developing importance of computers and of mathematical techniques, e.g. operational research. These developments have necessarily affected the accountancy profession and they have given rise to an increasing emphasis on research by the professional bodies and to changes in examination syllabuses and methods of training and education. The proposed post-qualification Certificate in Management Information and the Joint Diploma in Management Accountancy are examples of this change. The recent report of the Scottish Institute (summarized in The Accountant of March 20th) also demonstrates the process.

Although the changes seem rapid, many critics proclaim that they are not proceeding quickly enough. If there is truth in this argument it probably arises because the changes are made ad hoc, in response to external changes, as palliatives for an existing situation. There appears to be little attempt to look ahead to future needs and the future development of the accountancy profession. A recent report submitted by a committee of the American Institute of Management Sciences to the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, does just this. It is a thought-provoking, provocative and exciting document which deals with the emerging role of the accountancy profession and the educational requirements for fulfilling this role.

The committee 'subscribes wholeheartedly to the belief that management services . . . hold the greatest growth potential for the profession', since 'the range of experience in business matters gained by the independent certified public accountant uniquely qualifies him to counsel management on a variety of problems, if he is armed with a sufficiently rich educational background and perspective'. In some detail the committee examines its theory that to fulfil this role the 'accountant's education must include significant work in mathematics, statistics, electronic data processing, behavioural science, business core subjects and accounting. At least one-half of the accountant's formal university level study should be of a general scientific and cultural nature'.

There are probably many criticisms that can be levied at the study but it could with benefit be read on this side of the Atlantic. Even if much of the report is rejected by the reader, it at least might persuade some that an 'A' level standard in mathematics should be a prerequisite for articles or student membership. In a telling sentence the committee states that, 'a strong case can be made for the fact that "operations research" as a business discipline evolved to fill a vacuum that accountants should have but were ill-equipped to fill'. As an accountancy lecturer it seems to me that it is this lack of mathematical background which is likely to be the main difficulty to be overcome if accountants are to fulfil their future role adequately.

Yours faithfully,

Taxation Cases

Hotung v. Hong Kong Collector of Stamp Revenue

In the Privy Council – January 14th, 1965

(Before Lord MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, Lord PEARCE and Lord UPJOHN)

Stamp duty – Conveyance on sale – Consideration payable by instalments – Whether duty payable on total amount of consideration – Hong Kong Stamp Ordinance, sections 5, 34, 35, 36; Schedule, Item 21.

By an agreement dated August 27th, 1962, the appellant purchased certain leasehold interests for the sum of $10,800,000. The price was to be paid as to $450,000 on the completion of the assignment to the purchaser, and as to the balance by twenty-three equal consecutive annual instalments of $450,000 each on October 27th, 1963, and on the same day in each succeeding year. The purchaser was to pay interest on the balance of the price for the time being outstanding; and if he defaulted in payment of any instalment or of interest, the total amount then owing became immediately payable. The agreement was duly completed by an indenture dated November 1st, 1962.

Section 5 of the Stamp Ordinance of Hong Kong imposes the charge to stamp duty, and item 21 in the schedule provides:

> Conveyance on sale, the duty to be calculated on the amount or value of the consideration on the day of the date of the instrument.

It was common ground that the indenture was subject to stamp duty as a conveyance on sale.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the 'amount' in item 21 had to be ascertained on the day of the date of the indenture, and was therefore a discounted amount; and that as the words 'amount' and 'value' appear in item 21, and could produce different figures, there was an ambiguity, and the charge to duty was satisfied by payment of duty on the lower figure. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the phrase 'amount or value' in item 21 meant that in every case, save those in sections 34 to 36, the measure for the assessment of duty was 'the amount', i.e. the aggregate of the sums to be paid in consideration of the purchase, that is to say, $10,800,000 in the present instance.

Held: the words 'amount' and 'value' in item 21 were alternatives; that 'value' was the measure only for the purposes of sections 34 to 36; that in all other cases the duty was measured by reference to the amount, which in this case was $10,800,000.

Kirkcaldy Linoleum Market Limited v. Duncan and C.I.R.

In the Court of Session – March 3rd, 1965

(Before THE LORD PRESIDENT (Lord CLYDE), Lord CARMONT and Lord GUTHRIE)

Trade – Sale of trading stock – Open market value – Power to allocate price of business among separate assets – No allocation made – Whether General Commissioners' decision valid – Income Tax Act, 1952, section 143.

The appellant purchased the business of the first respondent for £7,500. The vending agreement provided that the purchase price was to be allocated as the purchaser might require, and the trading stock was to be valued at cost or market value whichever was the lower, but at not less than £1,250. It was agreed that the business premises alone were worth £4,250. In fact no allocation of the £7,500 was made among the various items.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant, the purchaser, that the amount to be ascribed to the trading stock was £3,250. The first respondent contended that the figure was £1,250. The General Commissioners decided that the amount was £2,060.

Held: there was no ground for altering the General Commissioners' decision.

Work Study in Office and Factory

London Chartered Accountants' Course at Brighton

BRIGHTON, and in particular the Hotel Metropole, is fast becoming a second home of the English Institute – a kind of Courses Centre. It will be the venue of a whole series of E.D.P. courses during 1965–66, and on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of last week the hotel was the home of the London and District Society's first residential course on the subject of 'The accountant and work study in office and factory'.

In his introduction the Course Chairman, Mr A. W. Howitt, M.A., F.C.A., F.C.W.A., said that accountants should be interested in work study for two reasons. They required to assure themselves – whether they are in practice in a professional firm or with an industrial company – that their own staff were efficient and that the cost of their work was reasonable. When it came to areas of work outside their immediate sphere accountants needed to be in a position to advise and counsel as to the possible benefits which can arise from the proper use of work study. Mr Howitt stressed that the purpose of the course was to make members aware of the objectives, methods and techniques of work study; it was not designed to produce trained work study engineers.

He did not pretend that work study was new: it stemmed from the work of Frederick Taylor and Frank Gilbreth, two Americans who lived at the turn of the century and published their main contributions to the literature of the subject before the First World War. But since all accountants were in some way concerned with promoting efficiency and the reducing of costs, the subject was worthy of study as it provided a logical pattern and proved techniques with which to attack the problem.

After this introduction to work study by Mr Howitt, and a short opening address by Mr R. McNeil, F.C.A., Vice-President of the Institute, the course got down to details so that almost within minutes members were involved in studying and preparing process charts, multiple activity charts, and flow and string diagrams.

Mr R. McNeil, F.C.A., Vice-President of the Institute (left), with Mr J. W. G. Cocke, T.D., M.A., F.C.A., Secretary of the Society (centre), and Mr D. W. Hooper, M.A., F.C.A., Technical Officer of the Institute.

Left to right: Messrs G. B. Judd, F.C.A., S. S. Wilson, F.C.A., R. O. A. Keel, F.C.A., G. Smith, F.C.A., R. McNeil, Vice-President of the Institute, A. W. Howitt, M.A., F.C.A., F.C.W.A., Course Chairman, E. P. J. Lunch, F.C.A., and A. G. Thorne, A.C.A.

Before dinner they turned to activity sampling, and the day's lectures, all of which were illustrated with slides or film, continued until 10 p.m., at which time members split up into groups for general discussion which went on until the early hours of the morning.

But they were back 'on parade' again at 9.15 a.m. on Friday morning to continue the 'Analysis of the existing situation' and 'Developing the new method'. The afternoon session was devoted to work study in the office, after which attention turned to time study, operation analysis, and incentive schemes. Guest speaker after dinner was Sir Basil Smallpeice, K.C.V.O., B.COM., F.C.A., who said that if he had his way, management would make more use of work study. Again, if he had his way, the work study manager would report direct to him as managing director. But he admitted that he had never found this practicable at B.O.A.C. as he already had far too many managers reporting direct to him.

The sessions on Saturday were devoted to production control and costing, and their relationship with work study. Members were shown the importance of production programming and proper shop loading, efficient documentation, and prompt feedback of reports to management.

The seven lecturers (if the Course Chairman is included) were all drawn from the practising/consultancy side of the profession, most of the leading consultancy firms making a contribution, and they included a number of engineers.

Training for the Profession

Comments at Birmingham Chartered Accountants' Dinner

TRAINING and recruitment were recurring themes of the speakers at the annual dinner of The Birmingham and District Society of Chartered Accountants held at the Grand Hotel, Birmingham, on Friday of last week, which was attended by nearly four hundred members and guests, with Mr C. Wheatley, F.C.A., President of the Society, in the chair.

His Honour Judge R. S. Nicklin, proposing the toast of 'The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales', said that the profession of accountancy was growing, and like the legal profession, it was essential that it should be well governed. That, he said, was why the Institute was so important.

It had to enforce and maintain discipline, so that while accountants did their best for their clients, they did not do so at the expense of professional standards. One of the Institute's most important functions was to improve and maintain methods of training, said Judge Nicklin, and in lighter vein he added, 'I know of your training scheme for articled clerks, and it is the most horribly efficient thing I have ever seen. The clerks have my sympathy!'

Nationwide Plan

Responding, Mr W. Guy Densem, F.C.A., President of the Institute, said it was proving difficult to get a nationwide plan for training, but they were making progress towards this end. He was pleased that the Birmingham Society was fully aware of the importance of training. It was the third largest district society in the country, and could boast the second largest Students' Society.

Referring to the increasing influence of computers in industry and commerce, Mr Densem stressed the value of computer courses which would help members to ascertain whether their clients would benefit from the installation of electronic data processing systems. 'We have to be looking ahead and making certain our clients are making appropriate use of computers for the more efficient use of clerical labour,' he said.

Turning to the subject of incorporated accountant membership of the Institute, the President said, 'I hope you have noticed that the Council are making proposals which should, we hope, resolve this difficulty that has existed for a long time. We are', he added, 'trying to resolve the difficulty, while still retaining the principle that to be in practice as a chartered accountant in this country you must have had experience in a practice.'

Mr Densem concluded by congratulating the Birmingham Society, which he said was 'worthily representing the image of accountancy', especially with their new library opened earlier in the day at Fountain Court, which he described as a 'magnificent effort' (picture and report on page 460). It was proof that the Society was one of the most active in the country.

Stronger Bonds with Universities

Responding to the toast of 'The Guests', which had been proposed by Mr C. Wheatley, F.C.A., President of the Society, Sir George Cartland, Registrar of Birmingham University, said Birmingham was one of the few universities which had a Chair of Accountancy. He was sure there were grounds for stronger bonds to be laid between the universities and the profession. The universities' contribution might be in the form of technical knowledge and expertise; it might be in the form of background education, or it might be simply breadth of view, he said.

Everyone, Sir George continued, was faced today with growing knowledge and expanding information in almost every subject or profession. In order to develop, it was necessary to have a breadth of view and an understanding of the world at large, as well as detailed knowledge of the small facts and expertise of one's profession. 'I have suggested what the universities can offer the profession, but the accountancy profession can offer the universities a lot too', he added.

Older people having contact with universities could bring to them reality and pragmatic experience. They could bring something which was perhaps missing in the so-called 'ivory towers' of the universities.

BIRMINGHAM CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS' NEW LIBRARY AND OFFICES

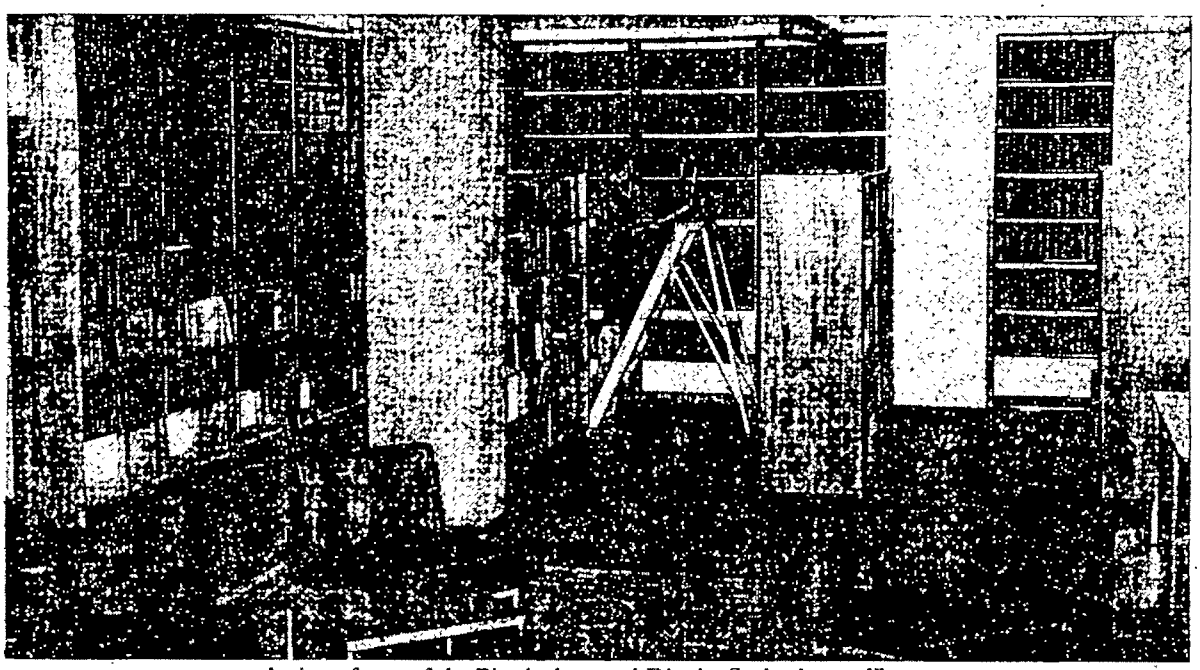
ON Friday of last week the new library and offices of The Birmingham and District Society of Chartered Accountants were formally opened by the President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, Mr W. Guy Densem, F.C.A.

The Society, formed in 1882 and now in its eighty-third year, has a membership of over two thousand three hundred chartered accountants situated in and around Birmingham and it is expected that members will make considerable use of the new library and offices in Fountain Court, Steelhouse Lane. The accommodation includes a lecture hall and reading room in addition to the library and offices.

It is interesting to recall that the Society's first library, which was opened in December 1883, was maintained in a room in the offices of the then President of the Society. In March 1888, it was transferred to 8 Newhall Street and the formal opening by the local President, Mr Howard S. Smith, took place in May that year. Nearly half a century later the library was moved again, this time to a self-contained suite of rooms in Eden Place Chambers, 71 Edmund Street; on this occasion the formal opening, which took place in March 1934, was carried out by the then President of the Institute. The temporary premises at 36 Cannon Street from which the Society has now moved, were first occupied in August 1957.

Mr C. Wheatley, F.C.A., President of the Society, in the course of his introductory remarks at the official opening, said that it gave him particular pleasure to welcome the President of the Institute and the Secretary of the Institute on so memorable an occasion.

'What you see today,' said Mr Wheatley, 'is the culmination of many months of hard work put in by various members of the Premises Committee and I would like to thank them all for the efforts they have made and also the architects who really have done a splendid job.'



Mr Wheatley then went on to express appreciation for the efforts of Mrs J. Harrison, Clerk to the Committee of the Society, and of her staff during the removal to the new premises and added that it was very appropriate for the President to see how wisely the Committee had spent their funds and the Institute's special grant towards the new library.

Opening the library, Mr Densem, in the course of his address, said:

'It must be a proud moment for the officers and members of the Birmingham and District Society of Chartered Accountants to have these fine premises as their new headquarters. What ideal accommodation you have now provided with your library, with adequate space for reading and a lecture hall combined which can be divided off. You have here all that is needed to provide that focal point which is so desirable in a district society.

'A library has always been found to be a basic requirement of a district society, particularly if it is an active one. We always regard the Birmingham and District Society as approaching the ideal in that they are really active and they do manage to keep alive that sort of feeling of keenness among the members and they maintain the interest of members in professional activities.'

Mr Densem concluded by saying he was sure that the new premises would add lustre to the image of the accounting profession in Birmingham and its area and expressed the hope that all members and students would not only enjoy using the new facilities, but would derive great benefit from them.

CERTIFIED ACCOUNTANT STUDENTS' WEEK-END COURSE AT OXFORD

ONE hundred and sixty certified accountant students foregathered at New College, Oxford, last week-end for the Association's first week-end school for students. An indication of the appeal of the school may be judged from the fact that well over three hundred applications for places were received. Principal credit for the school belongs to the Bromley Centre of the Association, whose members were responsible for organizing the whole of the technical work, under the able leadership of Mr D. R. Dawes, A.A.C.C.A., A.T.I.I. (senior partner of Messrs Dawes & Nicholas), and Mr C. H. Watson, F.A.C.C.A., A.M.B.I.M. (Head of the Department of Professional and Commercial Studies, Catford College of Commerce), assisted by Mr A. C. Jackson, A.A.C.C.A., and sixteen other lecturers, most of them members of the Association. Members of the Council of the Association present were Mr R. Statham, C.B.E., J.P., F.A.C.C.A., President of the Association, Mr C. A. Newport, F.A.C.C.A., Chairman of the Examinations Committee, and Mr E. A. Lediard Smith, F.A.C.C.A.

Participating students began to arrive at New College from about 1 p.m. on Friday, March 26th. The opening session at 6.30 p.m. consisted of a welcome by the President of the Association, followed by an explanation of the purpose and working structure of the school by Mr Dawes. The first working sessions began at 8.30 p.m. that evening and continued till 10 p.m. During the following two days the same pace was maintained and by 4 p.m. on Sunday afternoon one hundred and sixty rather weary, but satisfied students were leaving Oxford behind them.

One eminently satisfactory aspect of the school was the easy way in which it immediately dropped into a steady rhythm of work and even before breakfast on Saturday morning, students were already holding their own informal discussion meetings in every part of the college grounds. At a special dinner in Hall that evening, the President referred to this with approval and spoke of the need for personal discipline as the only certain road to success in the examinations and in their subsequent careers.

In his concluding remarks on Sunday afternoon, Mr A. W. Nelson, A.A.C.C.A., President of the Bromley Centre, said that the school had been an undoubted success, more so indeed than he had ventured to expect, and he hoped that it would become a regular feature of the students' year.

The closing speech was made by the President of the Association, who expressed to all those responsible for the school the sincere gratitude of the Council for their endeavours and warmest congratulations on the success that had attended them.

The higher pensions and benefits announced by the Government last year will start to be paid this week to about 7 million national insurance retirement pensioners and industrial disablement and widow pensioners; about six hundred thousand war pensioners will also receive increases from this week. Details of the new rates and increased contributions were included in The Accountant of December 26th last.

It is estimated that the extra cost in 1965–66 of the national insurance pensions and benefits will amount to about £271 million – including £187 million on retirement pensions – and total expenditure on all benefits will be in the region of £1,689 million. The extra cost in respect of industrial injuries benefits will total some £14 million in 1965–66, with overall expenditure amounting to about £98 million. The extra cost of war pensions will be about £15 million and the total expenditure over £120 million.

To meet the higher costs the income of the National Insurance Fund will be increased during the year by about £332 million to £1,819 million. Of this increase, £265 million will come from the higher flat rate contributions and £67 million from the Exchequer.

THE INSTITUTE OF INTERNAL AUDITORS

London Chapter

The Education Committee (Chairman Mr R. A. Brown of Unilever Ltd) of the London Chapter of The Institute of Internal Auditors has recently concluded a series of day-time addresses given at Unilever House for members of the London Chapter and their senior assistants.

These addresses, which covered a full day in each of the months from December last until March, aimed at providing members with helpful talks and discussions on practical aspects of internal auditing; they were conducted by well experienced internal audit managers. The aim was to give those attending wider appreciation of internal audit aims and objectives on practical subjects and so provide them with worth-while assistance in their responsibilities.

The subjects covered by the series included: internal audit and accounting by computer and E.D.P.; internal audit reports and records; repairs and maintenance; engineers' stores; stocks of manufacturing materials and finished goods; management accounting in an advertising agency; fixed assets and capital expenditure; product costing; 'ledgerless' accounting in respect of customer's accounts and sundry creditors.

Representatives of over fifty undertakings attended the sessions, the attendance varying between fifty and eighty-five drawn from all over the south of England.

The Education Committee is arranging another series for the autumn/winter session of 1965–66. Interested readers are invited to write to Mr R. A. Brown, Internal Audit Department, Unilever Ltd, Blackfriars, London EC4, to obtain details when these are available.

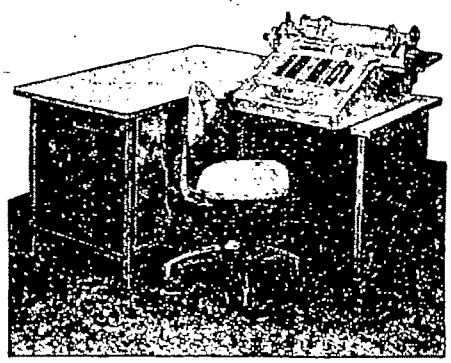
If you had 100 memories in hand . . . you'd be an E.2000!

What's that?
Burroughs new range of compact office computers.



And what are these 100 memories?
Technically, they're the alphanumeric words in the magnetic memory core which provide a total data storage capacity of 1,300 digits.

And that means . . .?
That the E.2000 is capable of unprecedented flexibility in handling accounting jobs.

So it's suitable for any type of business?
Yes, it provides more vital management data than ever before possible at such a low cost.

And at electronic speeds . . .
Correct. The speed and reliability of electronics simplifies procedures, cuts operating time and costs. Alpha and numeric data are stored, processed and printed in fractions of a second.

Sounds impressive!
It is! And yet the E.2000 is simplicity itself to operate.

Office computing is in good hands!

TAXATION AND PROPERTY TRANSACTIONS

Second Edition Now on Sale

BY EDWARD F. GEORGE, LL.B.

The abolition of Schedule A tax by the Finance Act, 1963, and the introduction of an entirely new system of taxation of income from land would alone have necessitated a second edition of this book. Although this major change in the system brought about the end of many anomalies, the enactment of provisions for taxing premiums and 'deemed' premiums on the grant of leases has led to a new set of hurdles to be overcome. Consequently a good deal of the book has had to be entirely rewritten.

The 1963 Act has had side effects in almost all branches of the subject and, apart from this, there have been various decisions on different aspects, all of which have been noted, so that in the result hardly any part of the book has escaped revision. This is particularly noticeable in the last chapter; what were formerly traps are no longer so, but the path is now beset with new snares to be considered and avoided.

MANAGEMENT ACCOUNTING

by Leslie V. Wheeler

Based upon wide experience in both general and consulting practice, this book should not only be of service to those who are studying for the Fellowship Examination of the Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, but should provide a stimulus to the professional accountant who is alive to the need for that 'improvement of costing and accounting practice which was envisaged by the Industrial Organization and Development Act'.

Although it would be unreasonable to expect a volume of some 200 pages to cover exhaustively the whole of this extensive field, fundamental principles are discussed at some length, and their application demonstrated by a wide variety of practical applications.

The important subject of marginal control is given a separate chapter while the section on budgetary control and standard costs focuses attention upon the practical problems which invariably present themselves in the planning and inauguration of such a system.

The book as a whole should be helpful to those executives who, though they may not be directly concerned with accountancy practice, will require an understanding of its principles if they are to make their proper contribution to industrial efficiency.

'It would be of benefit to accountants and secretaries in industry and to the executive responsible for the management of a business.' – The Secretary

Preparation for PROFESSIONAL EXAMINATIONS

by
J. H. BURTON

F.S.A.A., F.I.M.T.A., F.C.C.S., F.R.Econ.S.

This is a guide for those who are about to begin to prepare for professional examinations. Its aim is to give advice on the question of qualifying for a profession, how to seek exemption from the Preliminary professional examinations, and how to acquire the necessary knowledge to equip one to pass the examiner's tests. All study methods are explained. The foregoing, together with comments on the value of examinations and suggestions to enable the student to maintain health while studying, form Part I of the book.

Part II deals with the art and technique of using knowledge to the best advantage in the examination room – in other words, 'how to pass'.

Part III consists of advice to those who have taken the examinations including the successful candidates and those who have failed.

'. . . This book can benefit both the students and the professional bodies.' – The Cost Accountant.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF MANAGEMENT ACCOUNTS IN PRACTICE

by A. G. B. BURNEY, O.B.E., B.A., F.C.A.

PART A of this book explains a number of management accounting statements designed to assist various levels of management in controlling their costs. Part B describes the detailed costing and accounting procedures which enable the statements for a medium-size manufacturing concern to be prepared.

The emphasis is on practical management accounts, inasmuch as all the statements were designed for the everyday use of the managements concerned.

It is possible in this book to study a complete system of management accounting starting with the setting up of the necessary standard costs and budgets. The entries in the costing and accounting records are also shown together with the statements for top management, departmental managers and foremen. The system shows that the costing and financial accounts are integrated and reconciled.

Students should find this book useful reading for their examinations as it shows how theory and principles are applied in practice. Accountants in industry, whether they have experience of management accounting or not, should derive benefit from the experience of others.

As a practising accountant, the author has advised a number of businesses wishing to establish systems of management accounting. His experience in this field will be of interest to other practising accountants who are being increasingly called upon to assist their clients in this way.

Those responsible for providing training and experience for accountants will be interested in the author's view that accountants should become more closely associated with the problems of departmental managers and shop foremen as well as those of top management if they are to satisfy the needs of all levels of management for cost control information.

This book is therefore recommended reading for the growing body of students, accountants and managements who would like to become more familiar with practical management accounts.

Budget Objectives

MR CALLAGHAN's Budget needs to be assessed not so much in terms of taxes added or increased, but by its impact upon informed opinion throughout the world. For weeks now it has been evident that, despite the unfortunate and rather misleading conclusion in the opening section of the Economic Report on 1964 to the effect that 'by early 1965 it was clear that the pressure on the £ had eased', there has been serious doubt regarding the future of sterling. To assert that the second and third line defences are adequate to maintain sterling – for it is abundantly clear that the first line of gold and foreign currency reserves are not – is to miss the whole point at issue

The question is not whether the 'gnomes' in Zürich and elsewhere can, by their speculative activities, generate a run on the £ which could not be stopped. As long as the members of the 'Paris Club' and as long as the United States are together prepared to counter such speculative moves, neither the 'cynical and hard-faced' men in Zürich, Beirut or those anywhere else, can hope to do more than get their fingers burned. The simple question that has to be answered is how long the members of the 'Paris Club' and the Americans are prepared to support sterling above the exchange level which it could sustain by virtue of Britain's own efforts. It is quite pointless for minister after minister to assert that the £ will not be devalued; their inclinations or views will not affect the outcome either way.

The test is whether within the next few months it becomes evident that Britain's exports are rising sufficiently to warrant the prediction that by the autumn of 1966 the country's visible trade account is at least in balance. Even this waiting time can only be enjoyed if it is apparent to informed observers that the United Kingdom economy is, like Phoenix, rising from the ashes. The CHANCELLOR cannot continue to rely on external help which so far has been so readily given, not merely to defend sterling but also to support indirectly the United States dollar, and by such means to ensure that the current stresses and strains on the international payments system do not finally break it asunder. With the Americans bringing their own balance of payments into equilibrium, the need to ensure that sterling can stand on its own is greatly increased.

THE BUDGET

The Budget, presented in the House of Commons last Tuesday, is the subject of a special supplement with this issue.

Judged in the light of such considerations the opening section of the Economic Report reads more like a political manifesto than a serious review of the British economy during the past year. It is too full of emotive phrases to be taken seriously. Thus, 'energetic action was taken in November to deal with the emergency' . . . 'a beginning was made with long-term measures to remedy the underlying weaknesses'. What is the reader to make of the following purple passage:

> 'The same period saw the initiation of a drive for the modernization and technical improvement for industry. To ensure that the nation's resources are effectively mobilized and directed towards the objectives of steadier and faster economic growth, the Government has put in hand the preparation of a six-year economic plan covering the period between 1964 and 1970.'

What, in all seriousness, do such platitudes add up to in terms of early corrective action?

The means are quite clear whereby it should be possible to increase British exports sufficiently to ensure that sterling will be freed from the continuing threat of periodic speculative pressures engendered not, let it be stressed, by foreign ill-will, but by understandable doubt regarding the ability of the British economy to live within its income. First, there is a need to divert resources from satisfying the demands of the domestic market to meeting the more difficult requirements of overseas customers. Given the apparent impossibility of cutting the volume of Government expenditure and the obvious undesirability of limiting investment outlays, whether they be made in the public or private sector, the cuts must fall upon the consumer.

The CHANCELLOR's task is complicated, however, not merely by the difficulty of deciding in what way such cuts can best be made, but by the uncertainty concerning consumer-cum-taxpayer reactions to such additional taxes. In 1964, according to the Economic Report, the real rate of growth in consumer expenditure was less than it had been in the three preceding years. Furthermore, and as the Report rightly remarks, 'somewhat surprisingly' consumers did not try to increase their consumption despite higher taxes and prices at the expense of savings. In the current year the reaction may well be different.

A considerable factor in the CHANCELLOR's assessment of the economic situation is the level of unemployment and the demand for labour. The Economic Report noted that despite the continuous decline in unemployment, the growth of output, which should be the corollary thereof, was neither so consistent nor so evident. The lack of skilled labour constitutes a potential limiting factor on economic growth, just as inadequate mobility of the labour force means that the short-term benefits of the recent much increased investment in manufacturing industry are restricted.

The second facet of the Budget must be the provision of means whereby labour mobility can be facilitated so that resources freed from producing consumer goods may be rapidly and smoothly diverted to the production of exports. Mr SELWYN LLOYD'S untried payroll tax was designed for this end, as is the new scheme for severance awards. Possibly the shifting of a larger proportion of the costs of the National Insurance scheme on to industry might help achieve the same result. An effective increase in mobility would help also to achieve the third objective, a slower rise in industrial costs and prices.

To what extent are Mr CALLAGHAN's proposals likely to meet these needs? The Budget is mildly deflationary in so far as it removes some £160 million from circulation this year, but this is not by itself important. The crux of the problem is whether his proposal will make Mr GEORGE BROWN's incomes policy, or in plain language, restraint of wage increases, acceptable to the rank and file of organized labour. It may be doubted that this will be the result. Their reactions to the higher cost of tobacco, beer and spirits, as well as the surprisingly modest increase in the motor vehicle duty, to say nothing of the extra 6*d* on marginal earnings, will not be offset by the knowledge that surtax-saving covenants and business lunches are henceforth out.

The CHANCELLOR's evident concern with the private capital outflow is understandable, but the long-term disadvantages of restricting profitable overseas investment will probably more than outweigh the short-term advantages for the capital account of the balance of payments. The rejection of the overseas trade corporation concept is particularly to be regretted, since it was specifically introduced to enable U.K. firms to adapt their affairs to the growing international competition in foreign markets. As a means of meeting the immediate short-run difficulties, this Budget may serve; all the long-term problems remain.

Insured Values

by AN INSURANCE CORRESPONDENT

ONE of the basic problems in connection with the insurance of property is the value for which it should be insured; for this value is quite likely to be different from any other values which may be placed on it for other purposes. In general terms, much depends on the type of property and also the type of insurance policy.

There seems little doubt that, in both legal and insurance circles, it has been recognized for some time that in regard to buildings, the market value may not be the best value for insurance purposes. Although it is true that the aim of an insurance policy is to provide a fair indemnity, this may not be achieved if a claim for total loss is settled on the basis of the market value, for the buildings may have been of very much more value to the insured than the market value. If the indemnity is to be fair, the value should be based on the cost of replacement rather than the figure for which the property can be realized; for in the case of some buildings (and plant also), the replacement value may be considerably in excess of the market value.

It should be added, however, that should property have been allowed to deteriorate, the insurers might not be prepared to settle a claim on a basis which would place the insured in a substantially better position than that which he occupied before the damage was caused.

Limit of Liability

It has been argued that a fire insurance policy is simply a contract of indemnity which undertakes to place the insured in the same position after a fire as he was immediately before it – in so far as this is possible in pure monetary terms. Thus the limit of liability of the insurers in the event of loss is the sum insured, and no payment beyond this figure will be made – irrespective of reinstatement costs or market value. If, however, an insured can purchase a similar (and equally suitable) property for less than the cost of replacement, the principle of indemnity is satisfied.

In fact, the complications are likely to be such that this could not be put into practice. In any case, when thinking of the purchase of the new property, the cost should make allowance for the salvage value of the site of the old house or buildings, and all legal and incidental costs in connection with both the purchase of the new property and the sale of the old one should be taken into account.

Site Value

Incidentally, the fact that a site may be of considerable value has no small bearing on the subject from the insurance angle. For with the possible exception of earthquake, it can be said without fear of contradiction that none of the perils enumerated in the normal form of policy could destroy an actual site or plot on which any property stands. It is therefore pointless for the value of the site to be included in the overall sum to be insured. Accordingly, the most sensible arrangement is simply for the sum insured to be based on the actual cost of rebuilding in the event of total loss. If not already included in the policy, two incidental items should be added; they are the cost of removal of the debris of the damaged property and the cost of the fees which would be payable to the architects and surveyors in connection with the property.

Broadly speaking, these arguments apply both to commercial and domestic property. In each case it is advisable for the insured to bear in mind the way in which building costs are rising, and it is wise to consider the question of revision of the insured value at each renewal.

On the domestic side there is one point which should be borne in mind, which is unlikely to be pointed out by the insurers. It is that although the site cannot be destroyed, considerable damage could be caused to the garden, and the cost of putting this right might well be high. It should not, however, be thought from this that it is possible for plants, shrubs, etc., to be insured against the risks of storm, flood or even frost. Nevertheless, there is a very real risk for which insurance cover can be arranged; this is to provide an indemnity, in the event of a fire at the house, for the damage caused to the garden by firemen trampling over it and fire engines being driven on it.

The position in this connection is that if there is a policy on the house which covers the risk of fire, normally there would be no compensation as a right in respect of this kind of damage to the garden – although some insurers might be prepared to make an ex gratia payment towards the cost. In order that an insured should not be wholly dependent on goodwill in this way, there is much to be said in favour of an arrangement being made for the garden to be insured against fire risks for an adequate sum. This, of course, should be simply for the cost of replacement so far as the garden is concerned and in no way should it be related to the value of the land. Certainly the premium should be modest.

Rebuilding in Altered Form

Another point which may arise more often in the case of domestic rather than commercial property is when it is quite clear (due to the age of the building) that, in the event of total destruction, rebuilding would not take the same form as the present building. It is advisable in this case that consultation should take place with the insurers. It may be possible to come to some arrangement on the lines of virtually two sums being adopted. One would be the maximum amount which might be involved as a result of partial damage (in which case fairly extensive rebuilding in the same style would have to take place); the other value to be used only in the case of total destruction. In this case it might well be that a more modern, but less expensive, building could be erected on the same site. Here it should be borne in mind that all improvements incorporated in the new building would be paid for by the insured.

Problems concerning values are not restricted to buildings. They apply equally to the contents of premises, and goods or stock in the open. When fire risks cover is being arranged, there is something to be said for trying to discover whether any class of goods is absolutely impervious both to fire and water (in the long term as well as the short term). If it should happen that some goods really do fall into this category, it may be worth trying to arrange for these particular goods to be excluded from the cover provided by the policy. Even so, this is not always quite as easy as it sounds. For to exclude any goods in this way, it is essential that they should be capable of accurate definition in the policy.

It has been suggested in the past that the foundations of industrial premises need not be insured. The argument adopted by those who advocate this policy is simply that they will not be damaged seriously by fire. This may be making the whole position rather too simple, for it is unlikely that the new building would be precisely the same as the one which was destroyed.

So far as industrial buildings and plant are concerned, it is now becoming fairly common for the reinstatement basis of settlement to be used – although it cannot be adopted in the case of stock-in-trade. The principle behind this form of settlement is that the actual payment of a claim is made for the cost of rebuilding or replacement in a condition similar to that existing when the property was new. Nevertheless, there is no need for the premises to be built in eactly the same way as before; nor need the new building be erected on the same site. So far as the replacement of plant is concerned, on this basis there is no need for it to be of the same make or capacity as the plant which was damaged.

On the other hand, this again is not a device for an insured to make a profit from an insurance policy. Although flexibility is allowed under the terms of the policy, an insured firm is obliged to make itself responsible for any expansion which takes place at the time of the reinstatement. Incidentally, because a policy has been written on this basis, it does not mean that it is obligatory upon an insured to reinstate. If it should prove more convenient, a financial settlement can be arranged – on the indemnity principle. In this case the settlement would be based on the value of the property destroyed at the time of loss.

Indemnity Problem

One of the great problems in connection with the indemnity basis is that, fair as it may be in principle, in practice it is usual that an insured is required to contribute towards the cost of replacement and this may not be easy in the case of a large fire when the contribution needed may also be large. There are, therefore, great advantages in the replacement basis – especially for a firm which could not really afford to run the risk of loss represented by the difference between the two methods of claims settlement.

It is often said that average clauses in policies always operate to the disadvantage of insureds. Certainly they need to be carefully watched. In the case of the ordinary, or pro rata, conditions of average, an insured is regarded as being co-insured for the amount of any under-insurance. If, therefore, there is any under-insurance, irrespective of the amount of the loss, the claim will be reduced in the same proportion as the under-insurance.

Broadly speaking, it is usual for a policy to be made subject to average when an undivided sum applies to a plurality of goods. A typical example in this case is goods lying in the open. Average may also be applied when two or more risks are covered by one sum. Incidentally, in this case, the buildings need not necessarily be detached; it is more than likely that buildings which are separated by party walls or fire-proof floors will be considered to be separate risks for insurance purposes. Another occasion when the condition of average may be introduced into a policy is when the insurance is arranged on a 'declaration' or 'reinstatement' basis, together with the majority of insurances covering manufacturing and trade risks.

Clearly there are cases where it is known that the value of stock or goods is likely to fluctuate. In this case it is quite likely that the insurers may agree for a special condition of average to operate. One of the most common is what is known as the '75 per cent condition of average'. When this type of average clause is incorporated, the idea behind it is that it should not be necessary to adjust the insurance cover for every fluctuation in the value of the insured interest; for cover is provided for at least 75 per cent (or whatever other percentage may be imposed) of the value. In practice, therefore, any claim will be paid in full (up to the limit of the policy) provided the sum insured is not less than 75 per cent of the actual value at risk. Should the sum insured, in fact, prove to be less than 75 per cent of the value at risk, average applies.

In this case although average may not be applied, in the event of total loss the amount for which cover would not be provided could be very high. Certainly this is a point to be borne in mind. Seldom is any agreement with insurers all in favour of the insured, and this is an example of factors which need to be watched rather carefully.

The Modern Concept of Internal Audit

by J. H. PROTHEROE, A.A.C.C.A., A.I.M.T.A.
President, London Chapter, Institute of Internal Auditors

THE following rather uncomplimentary description of the internal auditor has been given by a professor of the Accounting Graduate School of Business Administration, New York University:

> 'The typical auditor is a man past middle age, spare, wrinkled, intelligent, cold, passive, non-committal, with eyes like a cod-fish, polite in contact, but at the same time unresponsive, cold, calm and damnably composed as a concrete post or a plaster-of-paris cast; a human petrification with a heart of feldspar and without charm of the friendly germ, minus bowels, passion or a sense of humour. Happily they never reproduce and all of them finally go to Hell.'

Unawareness of Real Objectives

Presumably the writer was either unaware of the real objectives of the modern internal auditor or was writing in jest. However, these objectives are often misunderstood by many business managements even today. They are also misunderstood by many accountants in industry and in public practice.

Many managements are surprised when the internal auditor extends his activities beyond the limits of the accounts department, particularly when the audit extends to production and commercial departments. Such activities were generally unheard of until a short time ago. Investigation may also extend to marketing operations, transport activities and other costs. It will certainly take a close look at profit margins. But why should there be surprise?

How Internal Auditing Develops

In a small business concern, the owner is in close touch with each of his employees and can personally watch over the progress of all operations. As a part of this process he operates, in effect, as his own internal auditor. He can note waste, irregularities or poor performance; his personal interest in the profits provides an incentive for watchfulness over all the affairs of his business.

As a business grows larger, this personal scrutiny of activities becomes more and more difficult. It becomes impossible to conduct the business on a one-man control basis. In large businesses, there will be many departments or companies often scattered geographically. There will be large numbers of employees responsible for a variety of operations and for spending and receiving large amounts of money.

In such businesses, responsibility will be delegated to many layers of organization – and top management's personal knowledge of detailed activities will be increasingly remote. Management's activities are largely concerned with formulation of policy, planning targets and programmes, and selecting the subordinate managers to whom responsibility for each specific area is delegated. A structure of controls and reports is established to govern the subordinate operations and to inform top management of the results.

In this normal situation, it is essential that management be assured that the policies, procedures, plans and controls that have been established are adequate and are being followed – and that accounting and other reports that are rendered give a true picture of accomplishments. The internal auditor is the analyst who investigates the control of detailed operations at the source; his analysis and recommendations help both subordinate and top management toward more effective control, better operations and increased profits.

The internal auditor must always explain his intended activities to the management of the organization or department being subject to audit, so that there shall be no misunderstanding. The management should then advise all departmental heads of the possibility that inquiries will ultimately be made in all departments by internal audit staff. Emphasis should be made that the internal auditor is working for the same company and that in addition to keeping top management fully informed he is also interested in improving overall efficiency and profitability. He is not there simply to criticize in a destructive capacity.

Objectives and Scope of Internal Auditing

The Institute of Internal Auditors lays down in detail the objectives and scope of internal auditing, an interpretation of which can be summarized as follows:

The internal auditor should ensure that:

(a) assets are properly safeguarded and accounted for, particularly stocks and work in progress;
(b) all transactions, financial and otherwise, etc., are promptly and fully recorded;
(c) there is adequate protection against waste, fraud, etc.;
(d) basic data is accurate to ensure that all accounting statements and information to management are correctly drawn up;
(e) the industry returns the profits expected of it. (If not, why not?)

It will be seen, therefore, that in addition to safeguarding assets, the internal auditor is concerned with the appraisal of all activities which have an effect upon profit margins. This means, of course, that the internal auditor has an interest in practically every activity of a business.

Typical Faults Discovered by the Internal Auditor

Examples of some of the faults which may arise from an examination of basic data are given below. These examples are taken from the combined experiences of internal auditors from several companies.

(a) An engineering company with 800 employees had an excellent order book and output but was making no profits. It was found that 70 per cent of the output related to standard production and the remaining 30 per cent to non-standard production. After much re-allocation of costs and overheads it was found, as expected, that good profits were obtained on standard production but losses were made on non-standard production. Inquiry into the 30 per cent of non-standard production established that workmanship was good, customers were well satisfied and they came back for more. The result over the years was bigger and better losses on this type of production.

(It will be seen that this company presented a commercial problem. The acceptance of special orders at uneconomic prices should have been discouraged. The company's competitors obviously discouraged this type of work by raising their prices as they preferred to concentrate on the profitable jobs. The management agreed that there was considerable scope for further standardization of their products and that there should be fewer variations from the standard products. Unless the customer was a valued one, special variations would be discouraged, except at a profitable price.)

(b) Comparison of actual costs of a product was made with sales estimates and large variations were noted. Explanations given by different individuals were that sales estimates were often incorrect and that component standard prices were wrong. Production methods had been changed and it was quite obvious that there was a serious lack of liaison between the production and sales departments. It was only the intervention of the internal auditor that brought both parties together.

(c) Labour returns showed a high standard of efficiency within the works, but this was not true as the returns were inaccurate. Standard times were out of date. No idle time was being booked. Rectification and development costs were not being allocated correctly.

(d) Excess material issues and returns to stock were not properly controlled and there was no control whatever over valuable scrap. Management were unaware of the real reason for stock discrepancies.

(e) There was no provision for making charges for customer variations. The sales department's approach was that customers should always be kept satisfied. The overall view should be, of course, to ensure that all operations are carried out at a profit.

(f) Selling prices in some instances did not even equal the basic cost of material and labour. This was due to management being unaware of true costs.

(g) Stock and work in progress figures were grossly overstated. Insufficient depreciation had been made for slow-moving and redundant stock.

(h) Purchasing procedures were found to be wasteful and expensive. Frequent repeat purchases of small quantities at high cost were noted. As the cost of materials represented 50 per cent of the selling price, large savings were available.

(i) Control of the bought ledger was found to be weak. A dishonest clerk could easily have defrauded the company of large sums of money.

(j) Credit control operations were found to be faulty. Large sums remained outstanding for excessive periods. With overdraft facilities costing 6 per cent, a reduction of overdue accounts amounting to £300,000 resulted in a saving of £18,000 per annum.

(k) Interim claims for work in progress were not claimed promptly as provided for in the contract. With monthly work values amounting to £200,000 and payment being received three months in arrear, the loss (in interest) was amounting to £3,000 per month.

(l) Transport costs were found to be excessive as inadequate loads were being carried.

(m) Poor dispatch documentation resulted in many dispatches being uninvoiced. The recovery of losses amounted to several thousands of pounds.

(n) Examination of the invoicing system revealed a weakness in the pricing procedure. Serious undercharges had been made.

Internal Audit Not a Routine Task

It will be seen from the foregoing that the internal auditor is not simply a ticker of figures. Nevertheless, the detailed financial side of audit must still be carried out, but emphasis is made that the petty cash mentality should be avoided. In the past this petty cash approach has been the downfall of internal audit.

The title of 'internal auditor' is possibly misleading and considerable thought has been given to revising the title – so far without success. What should it be? Some companies use the term 'management auditor', and possibly 'management audit department' may be the answer. After all, it is an extension of the management activity. But this description can still be misinterpreted by some levels of management.

The modern concept of the internal auditor has developed rapidly in the United States. It is extending fairly rapidly in the United Kingdom and most large groups and companies now have an internal audit department. Unfortunately, not all internal audit departments operate the modern concept, but restrict their activities to such matters as checks upon arithmetical accuracy and the conformity of accounting handling and internal controls with specific principles.

In many companies the chief internal auditor is responsible to the chief accountant, but this is not an ideal situation. If the internal auditor is doing his job properly, he will often be criticizing the chief accountant or group controller and this could obviously put him in a difficult position when criticizing his chief. The chief internal auditor should be completely independent of line management, and it is advisable that he should be responsible to the managing director.

Internal Audit as a Training Ground

The work of internal audit is a major responsibility in itself, but internal audit departments are also recognized as being the finest possible training ground for young accountants already in industry, or transferring to industry from public practice. Practical experience of the working of all departments is obtained and the young accountant benefits from observing the mistakes of others. After two or three years in an internal audit department he is invariably extremely good material for promotion.

As an indication of the growth of the internal audit activity in Britain, it should be noted that the Institute of Internal Auditors now has a total membership of nearly five hundred in the United Kingdom. The London Chapter alone has a total of 190 members. World-wide membership of the Institute is now 6,000.

The London Chapter has a meeting once a month at which interesting talks and discussions follow lunch or dinner. In addition, the Chapter arranges day courses for members and their assistants at which practical talks are given. Provincial chapters are based on Birmingham, Glasgow, Manchester, Newcastle and in Yorkshire. These chapters also arrange a varied programme for their members. An annual conference and the provision of much reading matter on internal audit subjects provides considerable assistance to members.

SCOTTISH INSTITUTE'S NEW PRESIDENT

AT the annual general meeting of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland held on April 2nd, and reported elsewhere in this issue, Mr Robert Browning, C.B.E., M.A., LL.B., C.A., was elected President of the Institute for 1965–66.

Mr Robert Browning

Mr Browning, who was born in 1902, was educated at The High School of Glasgow and at the University of Glasgow, where he graduated M.A. in 1923 and LL.B. in 1925. He served his chartered accountant apprenticeship with Messrs John E. Watson & Son, Chartered Accountants, gaining the John Mann Prize in the Final examination and being admitted to membership of The Institute of Accountants and Actuaries in Glasgow in 1926. He is now senior partner in the firm of John E. Watson & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Glasgow.

Mr Browning's election as President is a fitting culmination of many years of outstanding service to the Institute. He started lecturing to apprentices in 1928 and was a joint author of Legal Notes for C.A. Students, which was published in 1931. He was a member of the General Examining Board of the Chartered Accountants of Scotland from 1938–44, the Glasgow Institute's Director of Studies from 1944–50, and Professor of Accountancy in the University of Glasgow from 1950–64. He has also served as a member of the Scottish Institute's Special Committee on Education and Training whose recommendations resulted in 1960 in, amongst other things, the introduction of an academic year spent at a university into the C.A. curriculum. As Professor of Accountancy at Glasgow University, Mr Browning was able to give considerable assistance in bringing in this new form of training.

Mr Browning was convener of the Institute's Summer School Committee for four years from its inception. He has served on many other Institute committees, also being convener of the Special Committee on Electronic Data Processing for several years. He was a Council member of the Glasgow Institute from 1943–46 and of the Scottish Institute from 1952–56, and for the past year has been Vice-President of the Institute.

Outside the profession, Mr Browning has served as a member of the Royal Commission on the Press and has been chairman of the East Kilbride Development Corporation since 1958. He is also a director of the Clydesdale Bank Ltd, and chairman or director of numerous other companies. In the New Year's Honours list of 1961 he was appointed C.B.E.

The new Vice-President of the Scottish Institute is Mr Edward Birnie Reid, O.B.E.(MIL.), T.D., D.L., C.A. Admitted a member of the Institute in 1922, he is senior partner in the firm of James Meston & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Aberdeen.

INSTITUTE'S NEW COUNCIL MEMBER

MR A. W. JOHN, O.B.E., F.C.A., finance member of the National Coal Board, was elected a member of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales at the meeting of the Council on March 31st, and reported elsewhere in this issue.

Mr A. W. John

Educated at Marlborough College, Mr John was admitted to membership of the Institute in 1934, and from 1936 until the outbreak of the Second World War, was assistant to the commercial manager (collieries), of Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries Ltd. During the war he was twice mentioned in dispatches, and served as Deputy-Assistant Quartermaster General, First Army and H.Q. Allied Armies in Italy, and was Assistant Quartermaster General, Allied Forces H.Q., 1944.

In 1945 Mr John was appointed chief accountant of John Lewis & Co Ltd. He joined the National Coal Board in 1946 as deputy-director of finance becoming director-general of finance in 1955. Since 1961 he has been deputy chairman of the National Coal Board Brickworks Executive and has been chairman of the Board's Coal Products Division since 1962. In addition to these appointments, Mr John is also a director of J. H. Sankey & Sons Ltd and of Benzole Producers Ltd.

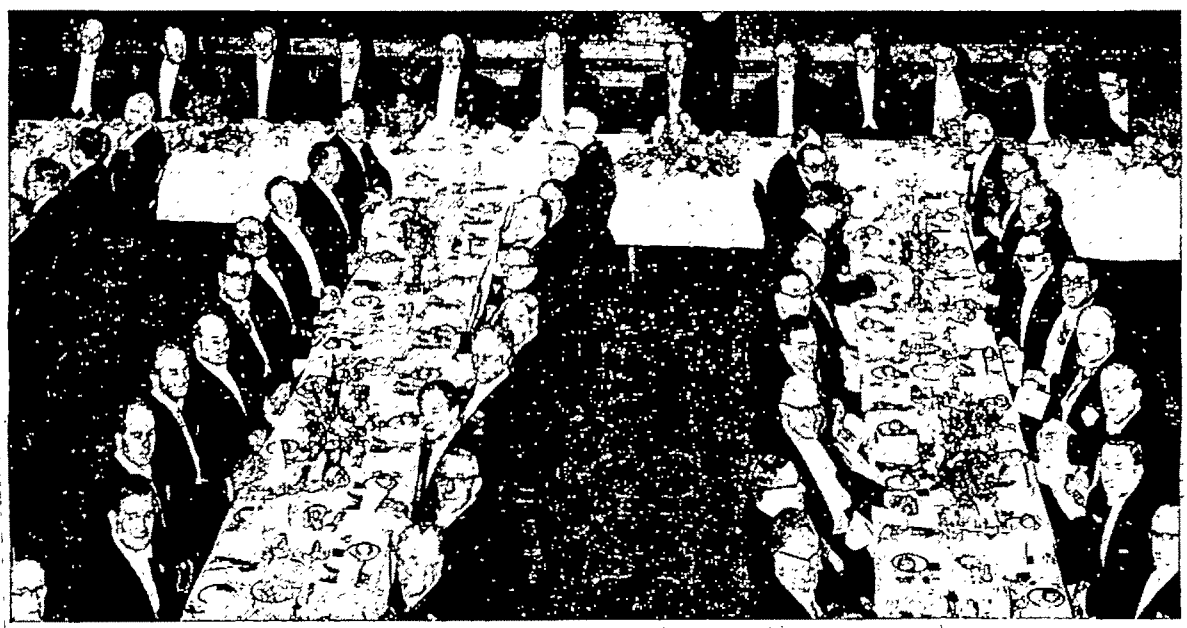
SCHEDULE E EXPENSES AGAIN

THE injustice suffered by the taxpayer assessed under Schedule E in relation to his more fortunate fellow taxpayers assessed under Schedule D has been highlighted by a new case in which the taxpayer was himself an employee of the Inland Revenue (Marsden v. C.I.R.O.) Mr Marsden was an investigator in the audit branch of the Inland Revenue, based on Manchester, and his work necessarily involved travelling from office to office in his area.

The Inland Revenue encouraged and approved of their officers owning cars and using them in their employment. Mr Marsden himself had a car and used it for official journeys, being paid an allowance therefor in accordance with the scale laid down in the official staff handbook. He claimed income tax relief for the excess of the actual cost over the allowance he received, on the ground that this was expenditure incurred wholly, necessarily and exclusively in the performance of his duties.

The Inland Revenue refused such relief stating that using a car was not 'necessary'; he could have gone by public transport and the allowance would have covered the cost. The Special Commissioners, on appeal, upheld this argument. The High Court, according to The Times of April 2nd, upheld the Revenue's submission that the question was one of fact and degree depending on the price, speed, purpose of the visit, and the status of the officer, and that therefore there was no power to interfere with the conclusion of the Special Commissioners that the expense was not incurred 'necessarily'.

PRESIDENT'S DINNER



MR W. GUY DENSEM, F.C.A., President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, gave a dinner in Merchant Taylors' Hall, London, on Wednesday of last week, when the principal guests were The Earl of Verulam, The Viscount Simon, C.M.G., The Lord Collison of Cheshunt, C.B.E., The Rt Hon. Douglas Jay, M.P., Sir Laurence Helsby, G.C.B., K.B.E., The Hon. Mr Justice Megaw, and Sir Richard Powell, K.C.B., K.B.E., C.M.G.

The following guests from overseas were also present: Mr H. G. Treffers, President, Union Européene des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers; Dr W. Elmendorff, Past-President of U.E.C.; Mr E. Archavlis, member of the Executive Committee of U.E.C.; Mr M. Masson, member of the Executive Committee of U.E.C.; Dr L. Perridon, Secretary-General of U.E.C.; Mr F.-M. Richard, President, Ninth International Congress of Accountants; Mr J. Wisner, Chairman of the Organizing Committee for the Ninth International Congress of Accountants; Mr H. Greiffenhagen, Institut der Wirtschaftsprüfer in Deutschland e.V.; and Mr A. L. de Bruyne, Director, Nederlands Instituut van Accountants.

MACHINE TOOL INVESTMENT

THE apparent reluctance of British industry to accelerate the pace of its new investment in modern machine tools as a means to more efficient automated production, seems to be due largely to the failure of management to recognize the benefits of the existing capital allowances offered by the Inland Revenue. Following the recently published National Economic Development Council report Investment Appraisal, in which the discounted cash flow method of evaluating the rate of return on prospective investment was publicized, the N.E.D.C. has issued a new report, Investment in Machine Tools (H.M.S.O. 3*s* 6*d* net), which makes it all too clear that the majority of firms are quite unaware of the benefits to be derived from capital allowances.

The report is based upon a sample survey covering some sixty engineering firms undertaken by the Management Consultants' Association on behalf of the N.E.D.C. and the Machine Tool Trades Association. All but 5 per cent of this sample of firms revealed that tax concessions had no apparent effect on their investment decisions. Even worse, notes the report, the typical business man is unaware of how an investment should be appraised to determine whether or not it is economically worth undertaking. The report adds that the methods generally used were 'either non-existent or inaccurate and misleading'.

To encourage firms to invest on a more rational basis, the report suggests the adoption of a simpler method of providing inducements to the industrialist. For example, he could be given the right to a cash repayment at the time of acquiring new plant in place of the present tax allowance; alternatively, the Swedish system of free depreciation whereby investment may be financed out of a pool of untaxed profits, could be adopted.

In the last resort, however, the same comments apply to these findings as were made in this journal regarding the earlier N.E.D.C. report. The real inducement for the industrialist to invest is first the prospect of adequate demand to keep the plant fully utilized, and secondly, the assurance that long-term planning will not be disrupted by 'stop-go' policies. D.C.F. is the ideal method where the market is near certain and the future can be evaluated with confidence by the larger undertaking with a dominant share in the market. The smaller firm is still going

IT's interesting to ponder on the respectable antiquity of the accountancy profession. We can look back on a long and distinguished story almost from the dawn of recorded history. An old and slightly 'blue' joke, unsuitable for The Accountant's respectable columns, falsely claims Adam as the first-known accountant, but in fact we have almost as ancient a lineage.

It was when seeing Shakespeare's Anthony and Cleopatra that the thought of our age occurred to me. This is far from being the Bard's best play but it has its finer moments, one of which illustrates some little skullduggery in an early example of a take-over bid. Cleopatra, surrendering to victorious Octavian, itemizes her captured treasures for him:

> 'This is the brief of money, plate and jewels
> I am possessed of; 'tis exactly valued . . .
> This is my treasurer; let him speak, my lord,
> Upon his peril, that I have reserved
> To myself nothing. Speak the truth, Seleucus'.

The treasurer, rather a worthy prototype of today's inflexible auditor among contending tycoons, says bluntly that his principal had held back 'enough to purchase what you have made known'; a truthfulness that seemed likely to cost him his eyes when the infuriated queen caught him. Even twenty centuries ago, there were painful perils in plain speaking for the profession.

There were also, no doubt, unusual problems. Cleopatra is reputed to have dissolved a pearl in the wine in a hectic drinking-bout with Mark Antony – an expenditure whose vouching must have caused her treasurer some headaches. Did it figure as the first ever case of liquidation of consumable stores?

The ancient Egyptian system of Government accounting was complex and meticulous, as might have been expected of a civilization whose mathematical genius is evidenced by its marvellous engineering and architectural monuments. Its tax collection procedures were similarly elaborate. The Vizier, or chief officer of State under the reigning Pharaoh, embodied in himself control of the administrative elements in the royal functions. These included agreeing and maximizing the tax assessments and ensuring prompt payment of arrears. He was thus, in effect, the first auditor.

The Vizier periodically toured the country to discuss with the Nomarchs, or governors of the provinces, their Budget forecasts. A wealthy agricultural country, enjoying vast external trade with such neighbours as Crete, Libya and Babylon, provided enormous revenue for the central Government, necessitating a huge central bureaucracy of scribes and accountants. Tax assessments were computed on estimated agricultural yields, based in turn on the 'Nilometers' which registered the annual rise of the Nile. Excavations have uncovered storehouses full of clay tablets or papyrus rolls analysing the tax returns of every citizen from the fellahin with their scrawny cattle, to the Theban merchant with a fleet of galleys or the army commander with his share of black-skinned loot from Nubia. Each paid in full without mistake.

Mercantile accounting must have demanded considerable practical knowledge of both agricultural and foreign trade on the auditor's part. Marketing of goods, astonishingly primitive in a land of such wealth and science, was maintained on a system of strict barter over a period of centuries. Neither mason nor court chamberlain received cash wages or salary: no coins changed hands; payment was made in kind. The measure in value was a uten (originally the assumed value of a spiral of copper wire); imports were financed by exchange of ivory, corn or jewels. Taxes were gathered as actual tithes of the income assessed; rewards granted to deserving charioteers by a grateful Pharaoh were registered formally in the central archives to facilitate the computations.

Still, our ancient predecessors presumably took it all in their stride.

to rely upon quick recovery of the funds invested, and in this case, D.C.F., while relevant, is not quite so important.

REDUNDANCY PAYMENTS

UNDER the Redundancy Payments Bill published last week redundant workers will receive up to one-and-a-half weeks' pay on severance for every year's service with the same employer.

The Bill covers the age groups between 18 and 65 for men and 18 and 60 for women who normally work more than twenty-one hours a week. The main exceptions are registered dock workers, Government employees and people other than apprentices or merchant seamen who entered fixed-term contracts of two years or more before the Bill received the Royal Assent. The two-year limit will exclude a large number of workers, notably in the construction and shipbuilding industries, who seldom work for an employer long enough to qualify.

Compensation is based on length of service. Those 18 to 21 would be entitled to half a week's normal earnings excluding overtime. Those between 22 and 40 would have a full week's earnings for every year and those over 40 to retiring age would have the week and a half. Service beyond twenty years and earnings over £40 a week would be ignored. This means that the largest sum which could be paid out would be £1,200. Employers would have to finance these payments themselves but some of the burden would be spread over industry by a surcharge of 4*d* for men and 2*d* for women on their weekly National Insurance contribution paid by the employer. When an employer had to meet the cost of compensation he could claim a rebate from the central fund equal to half the payments to those under 40 and two-thirds for those over 40. This would put the cost of the extra compensation for older workers on to the central fund and so not prejudice employers from taking on older men.

TENTH MERCHANTING INQUIRY

THE tenth inquiry by the Association of British Chambers of Commerce into the expectations of merchants engaged in foreign trade was published last week. The Association thinks that the results do not show 'any general recovery of confidence'. Since the largest group of merchants in the sample (eighty-five out of 261 in the case of exports and forty out of 164 for imports) are in textiles, the results hardly indicate the climate of opinion in the so-called growth industries when it comes to adding up the overall results of the inquiry.

Overall, merchants report a fall in new orders over the four months since the last inquiry was held, so far as exports are concerned. Delivery dates have risen and so have prices. For the future, all groups expect prices to rise and those dealing in engineering products, manufactured chemicals and 'other manufactures' expect an increase in new orders.

Radio Rentals

THE accounts of Radio Rentals Ltd, which provide this week's reprint, bring into discussion once again the question of the accounting treatment of shares issued for acquisition purposes. As Note 1 to the accounts shows, Radio Rentals took over the Rentaset company during the course of the year under review, issuing 14,523,122 Ordinary 5*s* shares for the purpose of acquiring Rentaset's issued capital and convertible loan stock.

For accounting purposes the company decided to deem the shares to have been issued at par and to show the surplus of the net assets over the consideration (on the par basis) at £6,180,231. It will be recalled that considerable discussion arose on a point of principle which itself turned on a similar matter in The City of London Real Property Company two years ago.

Opinion is divided on the question of using par or market value at the time of issue for the treatment in accounts of shares issued for acquisitions. Both methods, it can be said, are acceptable provided the effect of either course adopted is stated and shown clearly in the accounts.

Explanation

In Note 1, section (b) to Radio Rentals' accounts it is stated that the excess of £6,180,231 has been included in the consolidated balance sheet under the headings 'Net excess arising on consolidation £3,043,233' and 'Revenue reserves £3,136,998'. The latter figure can be traced through Note 2 to the accounts which shows £1½ million included in general reserve, a like sum in contingencies reserve and £136,998 added to the profit and loss account balance.

In the consolidated balance sheet, however, net excess arising on consolidation appears as £1,845,908. The company's explanation to a shareholder who sought reconciliation of the figures was that the net excess was reduced to that figure by £832,103 of goodwill brought forward from the previous year and a further amount of £365,222 in respect of goodwill brought in from Rentaset and other minor acquisitions during the year.

Without that explanation the reconciliation of £3,043,233 with £1,845,908 is not possible from the accounts and the notes on them. There is admittedly a limit to which accounts can be cluttered with notes

RADIO RENTALS LIMITED AND SUBSIDIARY COMPANIES

Notes on the Annexed Accounts

1. Merger with Rentaset Limited

During the year Radio Rentals Limited offered to acquire the whole of the issued capital and the outstanding £951,497 Convertible Loan Stock of Rentaset Limited with a view to merging the businesses of the respective companies. The merger has been dealt with in the Accounts as follows:—

(a) Since the 31st August 1964 Radio Rentals has acquired under the terms of the original offer and in accordance with the provisions of section 209 of the Companies Act 1948 the shares of those shareholders of Rentaset Limited who had not accepted when the offer was declared unconditional. The Ordinary Share Capital issued and to be issued has therefore been stated at the total amount in issue after the completion of the acquisition.

(b) The 14,523,122 Ordinary Shares issued at or subsequent to the 31st August 1964 for the acquisition of the whole of the issued capital and £934,316 of the Convertible Loan Stock of Rentaset Limited have been deemed to be issued at par and the consideration computed accordingly. The book value of the net assets of Rentaset Limited exceeded such consideration by £6,180,231 and this excess has been included in the Consolidated Balance Sheet under the headings "Net Excess arising on Consolidation £3,043,233" and "Revenue Reserves £3,136,998".

(c) The Consolidated Profit and Loss Account incorporates the results of Rentaset Limited and its subsidiary companies for the eight months ended 31st August 1964.

(d) Directors' fees and other emoluments shown in the Accounts include amounts in respect of the eight months' period to 31st August 1964 paid to three Directors of Rentaset Limited who were appointed to the Board of Radio Rentals Limited on 18th August 1964.

8. Guarantee

The Company has guaranteed the overdraft facilities of a subsidiary company to a maximum extent of £250,000.

but this would seem to be a point where a note reconciling the two figures would have been of considerable assistance.

Change

Acquisition of Rentaset has thrown up an accounting date change. Radio Rentals' accounts are made up to August 31st and the accounts under review contain eight months' profits of Rentaset whose accounts in the past have been made up to December 31st each year. The accounting date of both companies is to be changed to February 28th and the next accounts of Radio Rentals will be presented for a six months' period from September 1st, 1964, to February 28th, 1965, and the accounts of Rentaset will be for fourteen months to that date.

Arising out of the merger it was decided to establish the parent company, Radio Rentals, as the holding company for the co-ordination of group activities. From September 1st, last, the television rental business of Radio Rentals was transferred to a new company, Radio Rentals (U.K.), which operates in parallel with Rentaset.

In the process of co-ordinating the two main rental companies some reorganization on the property side is envisaged. For that and other reasons a revaluation of all properties was put in hand and the result of the operation will be 'furnished for the information of shareholders', when the accounts to February 28th are issued. There is no present indication that the revaluation will be written into the accounts.

Secret

IN presenting the report and accounts for the year, I have taken the opportunity of giving most of the relevant information requested by the chairman of the London Stock Exchange, together with a statistical statement showing the growth of your company over the last ten years. His request for interim information will also be complied with in that we shall in future issue half-yearly financial reports.' The words are the opening paragraph of Mr Bernard Hickson's statement with the accounts of Hickson & Welch (Holdings) Ltd, the timber preservatives and chemical group, for the year to September 30th, 1964.

Statements on similar lines appear frequently now in many company reports. The Hickson & Welch report, in the statistical survey, shows the ten-year growth in capital employed, earnings and dividend, and records pre-tax profit as a percentage of capital employed. Profit as a percentage of turnover is not shown because the directors have not so far brought themselves round to meeting Stock Exchange suggestions on that particular point.

Mr Hickson reports that most subsidiaries increased their turnover, that the home manufacturing companies in the group exported 52 per cent of their production and he shows the geographical split of where the exports went. But just what turnover and exports amounted to in figures remains a secret.

CITY NOTES

NOW that the Budget is out of the way there is at least a basis on which investment consideration can be placed. It may not necessarily be the basis that investors would have liked but uncertainty has been lifted.

After every Budget there is always scope for making bad bargains and probably this year will prove no exception in that respect. Post-Budget price adjustments and investment decisions can, at times, prove ill considered.

There is, at present, a common theme of doubt running through the statements of company chairmen attempting to forecast 1965–66 company results. Profits and dividends have been projected to such an extent that the market may run a shade short of helpful profit and dividend forecasting.

At the same time the equity yield basis is historically high and, even given maintenance of the current basis of front rank company dividends, there does seem scope for equity investment provided the new buyer does not expect a repetition of dividend rises stemming out of current year results.

The Free Pension Danger

SIR, – Whilst agreeing with the moral of the article 'The Free Pension Danger', by Mr William Phillips, in your issue of March 13th (i.e. that all agreements to provide retirement benefits, however informal, should be submitted to the Superannuation Funds Office for approval), I think it unlikely that the consequences of failing to do so, in the circumstances described in the article, would constitute a 'tragedy'.

The article deals with a case in which the Inland Revenue do not become aware of the pension agreement until payments of pension have actually begun, and seems to imply that it would then be too late to obtain approval of the agreement under section 388. This may be the correct legal interpretation of the Act, though I must confess that I do not see it and am aware of no test case which establishes the point. But the Superannuation Funds Office is outstandingly fair and reasonable in its administration of the Act, and I am confident that its normal practice would be to grant retrospective approval of the agreement under section 388, provided that the pension was within normal approvable limits, and thus avoid the application of section 386 (2).

At another point, the article suggests that Walter Smith would, if he became a controlling director, be faced with a choice between giving up his pension rights or paying income tax on the purchase price of the pension. But section 388 (1) (f) requires only that no pension should be granted for years of service while a controlling director. On the facts as stated in the article Walter Smith's years of service while not a controlling director are easily sufficient to justify approval of the amount of pension stated, so there is no possibility of his being faced with this invidious choice.

Nevertheless, Walter Smith's position might well become a tragic one, not so much because of income tax difficulties but because of the total lack of security for his pension. I would be very suspicious of Mr Watson's explanation for excluding him from the new pension scheme. After extensive inquiries I can discover no insurance company which imposes such terms, nor any actuarial reason why they should be imposed. I would suspect rather that Mr Watson, having neglected for so long to fund the pension liability for a well-paid employee with long service, and half expecting that Walter would insist on working till he dropped, is worried by the size of the premium required and thinks it might be easier to pay the pension out of revenue if and when Walter retires.

So Walter's only security for his pension is a verbal promise without witnesses. What will happen to his pension rights if Mr Watson dies, or the company is taken over? Or if the company goes into liquidation, before or after his pension has started?

The best advice for Walter is, therefore, to get it in writing, and if the pension is put on an insured basis, so much the better, for his pension will then be secure in all events and the insurance company will make certain that it is not caught in any of the traps of the Income Tax Act, 1952.

Yours faithfully,

Shepperton, Middlesex. W. R. HARDY.

[Mr William Phillips writes: I am most grateful to Mr W. R. Hardy for giving me the opportunity to correct a slur upon our life assurance offices and to enlarge upon the subject of controlling directors, the references in the article on both these subjects being too brief.

As to the legacy to Walter Smith, I took it for granted though admittedly did not say, that the 'retirement benefits scheme' approved by the Inland Revenue contained no reference to the possibility of Walter becoming a controlling director; I also took it for granted, though again did not say, that when he reached this status he and 'young' Mr Watson's successor would overlook the section 390 (2) provision that:

> 'Where an alteration has been made in a retirement benefits scheme . . . the scheme shall . . . be deemed to have become a new scheme coming into being on the date of the alteration [unless the] alteration [is] approved by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.'

Even if this subsection had been 'the constant topic of conversation during the long winter nights' it is unlikely that they would have realized how little constitutes an 'alteration' to the eyes of the Inland Revenue. I agree, of course, that this 'new' scheme would have been approved, just as would the original scheme.

As to my injustice to the life offices, the position appears to be that, as Mr Hardy says, so many employers have jibbed at the cost of funding pensions due within a year or two that the 'model' rules which form an essential part of the sales material commonly exclude members within five years of retirement date. My life assurance friends assure me, and of course I accept, that if the Watsons asked for inclusion of these members they would accede, but all too often they do not ask. In any case the article was dealing with what has in fact so often happened, not with what ought to have happened, and it should be added that a similar exclusion from membership of employees within five years of retirement date is frequently found in self-administered unreinsured schemes.

Most of the 'Walter Smith' agreements are, in fact, in writing; the article took the extreme and less usual case of an oral agreement to emphasize the wide scope of section 386 (2). One would not raise, in argument against Mr Hardy's view that the Inland Revenue would grant extra-statutory respective approval if they did not discover the existence of the agreement until Walter's pension began to be paid, that the House of Lords has more than once criticized extra-statutory concessions. (See, for example, Lord Radcliffe's remarks in Frere v. C.I.R. [1964] T.R. 333 at page 340.) One merely notes that there are thousands of 'Walter Smith' agreements in force, whether written or oral, never yet submitted to the Commissioners for approval, and puts forward the view that the proper, the neatest, and the safest course is to apply for retrospective approval at the earliest possible moment.]

Accounting Information and Business Decisions: A Simulation

by JACK GRAY, PH.D., C.P.A., KENNETH S. JOHNSTON, PH.D., JOHN J. WILLINGHAM, PH.D., C.P.A., and R. GENE BROWN, PH.D., C.P.A. (McGraw-Hill Publishing Co Ltd, Maidenhead, 15*s* net.)

This is a business game designed with four objectives in mind. First, to demonstrate how accounting information is used in the decision process. Second, to show the inter-relationships between financial statements and the methods of accumulating data for these statements. Third, to show how business decisions affect financial statements, and, fourth, to show how accounting methods influence the decisions to be made.

The pages are perforated and there is enough tear-off stationery for several competitors. An interesting feature of the game is the list of options available to the instructor, e.g. whether to adopt cash transactions or credit transactions. Rules are given for each option. Options can be introduced into the competition at any time during the competition period of eighteen months (six quarters).

This game can be quite useful to any accountant wishing to introduce his fellow executives, or clients, to such management accounting tools as cash-flow statements and project expenditure authorization requests, as these forms have to be submitted in some detail during the course of the competition.

Case Studies in Management

edited by MICHAEL IVENS and FRANK BROADWAY. (Business Publications Ltd, London. 55*s* net.)

This book fills a gap in British management literature. The 102 case studies cover a wide range of management subjects, including production, marketing, finance, research, administration and human relations.

The 'Fawley Agreement' is the subject of one case study. Like the majority of the case studies and their questions, the Fawley case can lead one to a useful examination of aspects of one's own business. The cases do not have to be reserved solely for use in management courses. In fact, most executives could easily find some useful material to liven up the next working conference of their subordinates.

The section on merger projects is very topical and comprehensive, and is especially suitable for immersing managers and students alike in such fundamentals as organization and policy-making.

In lighter vein, there are case studies on 'the executive with the roving eye', 'the girl in tight trousers', and 'the hatchet man'.

New forms of case study are introduced towards the end of the book, such as the continuous consequential case study. This requires considerable preparation by the tutor but has the advantage of reality for the student inasmuch as his own decisions for situation 1 create the environment for situation 2, and so on. This is altogether an instructive and entertaining book.

Handbook of Accounting Methods

Third edition, edited by the J. K. Lasser Institute. (D. van Nostrand Co Ltd, London. 116*s* net.)

This is a series of essays contributed by American writers on systems of accounting and layout of final accounts appropriate to sixty-six different types of business, with an introduction on data processing and a section on 'going public'.

There is a valuable chapter on the use of data processing in small businesses and though the text is prepared for the American market it will provide valuable hints for the reader in any country. One feature lent to the book by its American influence is the greater connection than is usually to be found between costing and traditional accounts, and the classification of accounts is excellently dealt with.

Those interested in management accounting techniques and their application to small businesses will find much to their profit in this collection. In any such collection there will be omissions, of course, but the compass of the book is wide enough to cover most of the situations arising.

The section entitled 'Registration of stock for sale to the public' is as enlightening to anyone involved in similar work in the United Kingdom as to those involved in 'going public' in the U.S.A.

Investment Arithmetic

Second edition, by M. S. RIX. (Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons Ltd, London. 30*s*.)

This second edition of a book first published in 1951 is described as 'a practical guide to methods of calculation for investors and students'. Starting with simple descriptions of various types of securities, it goes on to deal with the taxation of investment income in the United Kingdom (including double tax relief), new issue procedures, and so on, leading into a discussion of prices.

Then follows the 'meat' of the book: there is a description of how yields are calculated, including gross redemption yields (or bond values) and the calculation of yields on dollar securities in sterling. There are chapters describing how equity earnings are calculated and on gearing and priority capitals. There is a comparison of the market valuation of a company's shares with balance sheet values, and cover and cash flow are briefly explained.

A final chapter added for this edition deals with statistical method in the various indices used in financial literature.

This is a most useful book for all students to read in connection with their studies on financial matters, and would be helpful to many an ordinary investor who desires to understand his daily or weekly financial Press more clearly. The author writes economically and clearly, and avoids getting too deep in to the more technical sections. For greater detail he refers the reader to a selected bibliography.

THE INSTITUTE OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS OF SCOTLAND

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING

The annual general meeting of members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland was held at Chartered Accountants' Hall, 218 St Vincent Street, Glasgow, on Friday, April 2nd, with Mr J. W. Dallachy, M.A., C.A., President of the Institute, in the chair.

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

Moving the adoption of the annual report of the Council, the President said in the course of his address:

'The report gives a brief summary of some of the work which has been done during the past year, and I think it shows that neither the Council nor the various committees have been idle. I would take this opportunity of thanking all those members who have contributed in some way to the work of the Institute during the past year. I would like to amplify the report in three directions.

Mr J. W. Dallachy.

'First of all, in referring to the Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services, the report states that the approval of the Privy Council was awaited. I am pleased to be able to announce that approval of the alterations to the rules has now been received from that body. There is a vast amount of work to be done between formulating the proposals as set out in the booklet issued last November and having in operation a full-scale scheme with examination and all other requirements. This work has been proceeding actively during past months and excellent progress has been made. It is hoped that the first examinations will be held in 1966. Further details of this examination and application forms for those qualified for exemption from Part I of the scheme, and the transition arrangements, will be made available as soon as possible.

'In the second place the report contains a number of references to various aspects of education in the profession. I wish to say something on one matter which impinges on all aspects of this subject, but which is not touched on in the report, namely, the supply of lecturers and teachers. Over the whole field of education, at all levels, there is a teacher shortage and education in the profession is no exception.

'We in the Institute are greatly indebted to the Scottish universities for what they are doing for our apprentices; we are greatly indebted to the directors of studies and to all those who assist in our own tutorial classes, and we are greatly indebted to those who have given time to the organization of and the instruction at the post-qualifying courses. It remains true, however, that at all stages of professional education it is extremely difficult to get a supply of lecturers and assistants adequate in numbers and quality.

'Today, I wish to make an appeal to members and particularly to the younger members to consider taking an active part in the teaching of accountancy. Some may have doubts as to their suitability or their aptitude for the work, and I would suggest to them that they can give it a trial in a way which involves a minimum of commitment on their part by offering their services to their local director of studies. The experience they would gain can do them nothing but good as there is no way of acquiring a full knowledge of some branch of professional work which is quite so effective as having endeavoured to instruct others in that particular branch.

'Further, if having tried part-time tutorial work the member finds an interest in teaching, my plea is that serious consideration be given to taking it up on a whole-time basis at a university. The departments of accountancy at the universities are in urgent need of whole-time assistants and as these departments are expanding the need and the opportunities will increase. All universities are anxious to do research work and this opens up a prospect of absorbing interest.

'I am satisfied that there is now available to the young accountant a career in the academic field. Remuneration as a lecturer rises to approximately £2,500; opportunities for further promotion will be open and experience elsewhere has shown that a period of university teaching can be a stepping-stone to a responsible appointment in other fields.

'Thirdly, there is a committee which does not feature in the body of the report, namely, the Farm Records Committee. The reason for this is not that our committee has been inactive, but that at the time of going to press it was so actively engaged in negotiations with the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, the National Farmers Union of Scotland and the Colleges of Agriculture, that it seemed inadvisable to put in print any statement regarding its progress. I am pleased to be able to report to you now that these negotiations have been virtually completed and as a result a Farm Record Book in an agreed form will be issued shortly.

'The Council of the National Farmers Union of Scotland believed that better records and a better knowledge of what was in the records could help the farmer to take informed decisions as to the management of his farm. It was recognized that most farmers would continue to rely on their professional advisers to supervise their records and prepare their annual accounts and therefore the full co-operation of the accountancy profession was essential to the success of any attempt to get improved records and more helpful annual figures.

'The Institute has, therefore, been co-operating in the production of a Farm Records Book in which will be recorded particulars of crops, livestock, etc., as well as details of financial transactions all in such a way that figures are readily available for the farm management adviser to do his job.

'The book will be in loose-leaf form and is intended to allow for a good deal of variation in the manner in which the original cash records are prepared. Practitioners who are at present operating a satisfactory system of getting records from farmers will not require to alter these. They will find, however, that the specimen profit and loss account varies in layout and, in some cases, in terminology from what has been practice in the past. It is designed to be something more than just a document required for taxation purposes. I hope that a real endeavour to adopt the new form will be made by those who are preparing accounts for farmers. Our aim must always be to provide the best possible service to our clients and the purpose here is to see that his accounts and records are in such a form that figures on which to base management advice can readily be obtained.'

In response to the President's invitation for questions, Mr Aitken of Glasgow referred to the tutorial classes and suggested that something further might be done to give senior apprentices a broader view of their responsibilities as professional men.

The accounts of the Institute for 1964 and the annual report of the Council for 1964–65 were then adopted.

Mechanized Accounting or Computer Services

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

"The Council is of the opinion that members should be encouraged in the interests of clients and of the profession as a whole to provide mechanized accounting and computer services, it being recognized that the opportunity to do so will be taken in increasing degree by others. The Council accordingly wishes to draw the attention of members for their guidance to the following points:

(a) A member should neither advertise nor solicit for mechanized accounting or computer services work except that he may write a personal letter or make a direct approach to another member of the profession in practice; he should not however issue any circular.*

(b) Such services may be offered through a firm or an unlimited company but, in the case of practising members, should not be offered through limited companies.

(c) While the name of the firm or unlimited company may be similar to that of a member or firm it should not be indicative of the activities of the company.

(d) A member offering such services should not normally accept auditing, taxation or other conventional accountancy work from any client introduced to him by the client's own professional accountant for the provision of mechanized accounting or computer services.

(e) In the event of an introduction for mechanized accounting or computer services other than through the existing professional accountant it is desirable that the member should communicate as a matter of professional courtesy with the existing professional accountant notifying him of the special work he has been asked to undertake.'*

Members Seeking Work Within the Profession

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

'The Council wishes to inform members, for their guidance, that there is no ethical reason why a member in practice should not write a personal letter or make a direct approach to another member of the profession in practice offering his services; he should not however issue any circular.'*

'This statement should be read in conjunction with the statement on "Advertisements by members seeking employment or professional work" (paragraphs 5 and 6 of section E3 of the Members' Handbook) which precludes a member from advertising in the Press for part-time employment or sub-contract work.'*

The Administration of a Chartered Accountant's Practice

It was reported that arrangements had been made for publication on April 22nd, 1965, of the first booklet in a series on practice administration. Initially, the series would contain ten booklets, each dealing with one aspect of the conduct of a professional practice. The series recognized the need among many members in practice – a need which was underlined by the Practitioner Inquiry – for advice and guidance on the internal administration of professional practices, both large and small.

The first booklet to be published would be The

ENQUIRIES INVITED

Does your present Pension Scheme offer an adequate hedge against inflation

Impossible to doubt the desirability of protection of this kind. Unfortunately, the very nature of most pension schemes leaves them largely at the mercy of long-term inflationary trends.

The solution can be a privately administered pension plan with wider latitude in its investment provisions. This is the basis on which we work at Chase Manhattan. In conjunction with an independent consulting actuary, we would aim to provide for you a plan which is weighted in favour of growth investment. Protection against inflation is, as a result, built in.

Why not have a chat with us, let us show you how a plan can be prepared to meet your precise requirements. You'll discover just what an advantage it is to have a friend at Chase Manhattan.

PRESENTATION OF PRIZES

Presenting prizes and certificates of merit in the September and November 1964 examinations of the Institute on Wednesday of last week the President said:

'It is very pleasant to be able to welcome you all here. It is always a happy occasion to see the prize winners and their relatives and friends, and we have to thank the Saddlers' Company for allowing us to use this magnificent hall.

'We have a very large number here today because we have prize winners from the September Intermediate examination, which was the first Intermediate examination under the new syllabus; and also we have those who took the old Intermediate in November. I do not know if the successful Intermediate candidates think they are in the saddling enclosure for the Final or not. Those who took the September examination found, I expect, that they were taking it a little earlier than normally by reason of the new rules and they also had the advantage of a somewhat shorter examination. We like to think that the height of the fences was the same but the width was reduced; we trust that is how you found it. The November Intermediate examination candidates, of course, were sitting almost the last of the old examinations.

'I would like to congratulate all the Intermediate candidates. It should give them confidence to go forward for their Final. You must not allow that confidence to make you think you can do a little less work for the Final. What you have to do, having proved that you have ability, is to apply that ability in your practical work together with imagination and an inquisitive mind, so that you make the greatest use of your opportunities and get the maximum benefit from your practical experience in order that life, when you come to your Final, should be a little easier and you should be able to follow your studies with a little more interest.

'Turning to the Final candidates, they are all probably heaving a vast sigh of relief that they can now, if they behaved themselves during articles, apply for admission. Of course, they are still really only on the threshold of their careers. They are now trying to decide what their future is going to be and I hope that they will all realize that even if they have managed to pass the Final, they still have quite a long way to go to get all that additional experience and knowledge which is going to bring them to the top. I once said that the really successful chartered accountant finds that almost every other day he learns something new and that is even more applicable to the young qualified man. He still has a lot to learn but those who are here – the prize winners – have shown that they have the ability to absorb knowledge and I trust they will make the best use of that. I wish you all every success in the future.'

FINDING AND DECISION OF THE DISCIPLINARY COMMITTEE

Finding and Decision of the Disciplinary Committee of the Council of the Institute at a hearing held on March 3rd, 1965.

A formal complaint was preferred by the Investigation Committee of the Council of the Institute to the Disciplinary Committee of the Council that Sidney Stead Cawthra, an Incorporated Accountant member of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, was at the Burnley Quarter Sessions held on September 18th, 1964, convicted of six offences of false claims in respect of income tax relief and was fined £240 so as to render himself liable to exclusion or suspension from membership of the Institute. The Committee found that the formal complaint against Sidney Stead Cawthra, F.S.A.A., had been proved and the Committee ordered that Sidney Stead Cawthra, F.S.A.A., c/o Messrs T. H. Taylor & Son, Swadford Chambers, Skipton, Yorkshire, be excluded from membership of the Institute.

The new book, which extends to 372 pages, contains the usual alphabetical and topographical list of members, together with information about the Institute's branches, sub-branches and student societies, and its seven centres in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Students' Course at Oxford

The fifth week-end course for students to be arranged by the No. 1 Area (London and South-east England) of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants was held at Oriel College, Oxford, during the week-end March 26th–28th.

All subjects in parts 1–4 of the Institute's examinations were covered by fourteen speakers, and the seventy-five students who attended were divided into three streams.

The course was opened by Mr G. R. Coe, F.C.W.A., M.B.I.M., Chairman of the No. 1 Area Co-ordinating Committee, and the President of the Institute, Mr J. P. Wilson, F.C.W.A., F.C.I.S., addressed the students after dinner on Friday evening. He stressed the importance of objectivity in studying and the need for subjects to be considered from the broad aspect.

On Saturday evening, Mr J. Borsay, F.C.W.A., a Past President, spoke on the history of accounting and the part played by The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants.

Guests who visited the course included Dr James M. S. Risk, B.COM., PH.D., C.A., F.C.I.S., F.C.W.A., F.B.I.M., a member of the Council and chairman of the Education Committee. Dr Risk was the Chairman and organizer of the first students' week-end course to be held in Oxford.

BUSINESS STUDIES DIPLOMA AT SHEFFIELD UNIVERSITY

In 1962 the Department of Business Studies of the University of Sheffield inaugurated a one-year post-graduate course leading to a Diploma in Business Studies. The syllabus has now been completely revised to give the diploma greater analytical and quantitative content. The diploma places special emphasis upon modern techniques of financial management in which subject the department is specializing. The courses of the diploma are: financial and managerial mathematics; managerial economics; management accounting; capital budgeting and financing; operational research techniques.

The department considers that the new emphasis on financial subjects will make the diploma particularly attractive to accountants. In view of this, the regulations of the diploma have also been changed in order that places may be offered to members of recognized accountancy bodies who may not have a degree. Further information, and application forms, may be obtained from Dr M. Howe, Department of Business Studies, The University, Sheffield 10.

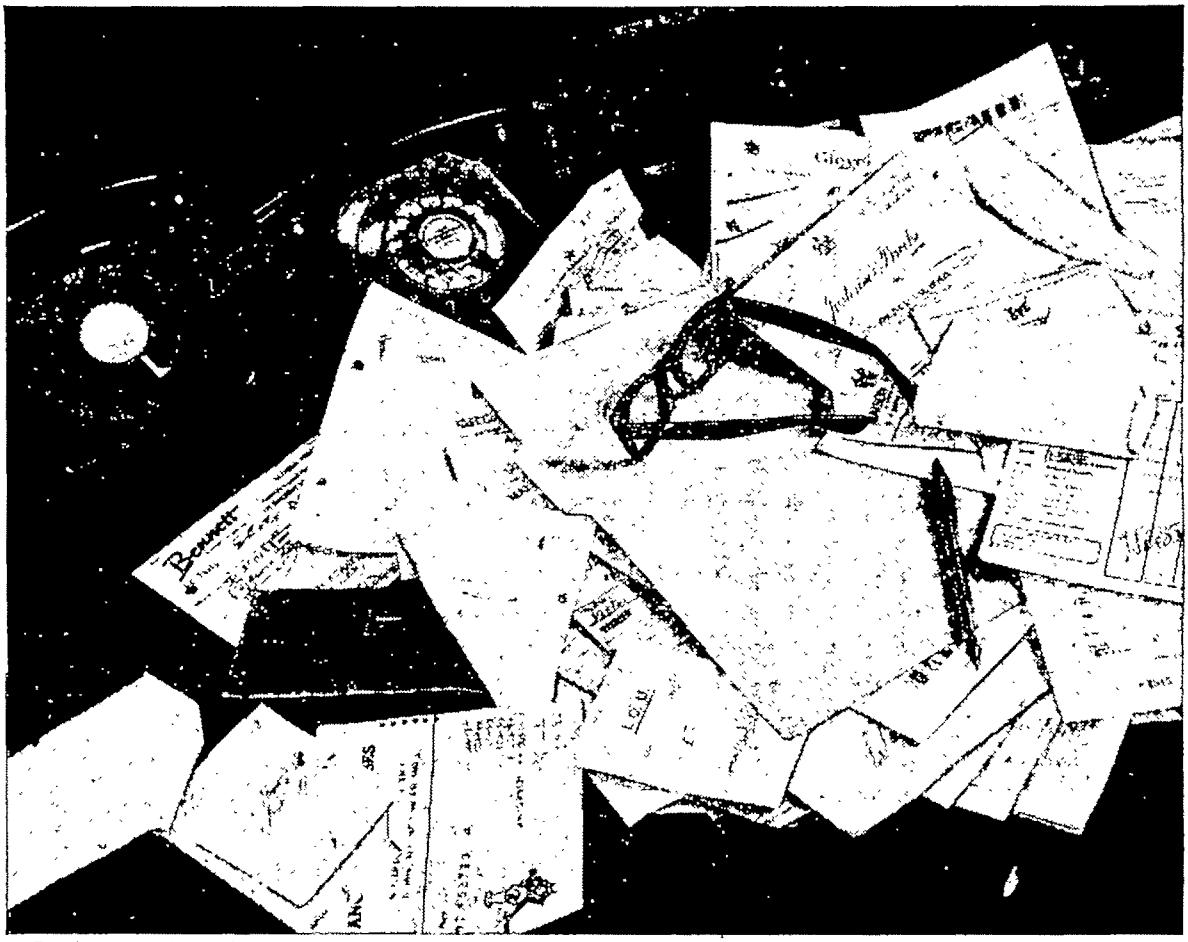
THE INSTITUTE OF INTERNAL AUDITORS

London Chapter

A luncheon meeting of the London Chapter will be held on April 14th at 12.30 p.m. at the Kingsley Hotel, Bloomsbury Way, London WC1, when Mr J. C. Walker, of H. J. Heinz Co Ltd, will speak on 'The relationship of O. & M. to internal audit'.



The proceedings will be informal, and interested non-members of the Chapter will be welcome by arrangement with the Hon. Secretary, Mr N. A. Smith, Unilever Ltd, Unilever House, Blackfriars, London EC4.

CORRECTIONS

In our reference last week under 'Courses and Conferences' to the Institute's summer course at Oxford, it was incorrectly stated that Mr H. C. Treffers, President of Union Européenne des Experts Comptables, would be giving an informal talk on Sunday, July 18th. Mr F.-M. Richard, President of the Ninth International Congress of Accountants, will in fact give an informal address to members.

In the 'Appointments' column of the March 27th issue, we should have stated that Mr N. Timmis, A.C.A., has been appointed chief accountant of E. N. Mason & Sons Ltd, not chief cost accountant.

Receipts, receipts, receipts . . . some typed, but many scribbled and often illegible. A nightmare for the man who has to check them.

When executives' expense accounts drive company secretaries up the wall

FEW routine jobs are more tedious or less rewarding than checking the details of an expense account. So these days shrewd company secretaries enroll their executives as members of the Diners' Club. The Diners' Club credit card enables a member to stay at almost any hotel on credit, and also to eat, drink, travel and entertain—at home or abroad—at the best places within the scale approved by his firm. His expenses are looked after automatically by the Club, who keep accounts for him and send him a fully itemised statement which is acceptable to the tax authorities as proof of expenditure. This one clear statement takes the place of a mass of receipts. One monthly cheque to the Diners' Club pays the expenses of all executives who are members. And the only cost is the small annual membership subscription—there is no interest charge whatever for credit.

Each member receives a monthly statement itemising all his expenses in a form acceptable to the tax authorities.

POST TODAY TO: THE Diners' CLUB OF GREAT BRITAIN
365 Euston Road, London. N.W.1. Telephone: EUSton 5444

Please send particulars of the Diners' Club and special company terms to enrol my executives.

BUILDERS' COST CONTROL BONUSING AND ACCOUNTS

by

F. BRANDWOOD, A.C.W.A., A.M.B.I.M.

Written by an Accountant who has had many years' experience in the Building and Civil Engineering Industry, the book is designed to bring modern techniques in accountancy and costing to the industry.

It is divided into three main sections:

(1) The financial accounting aspect.

(2) Cost control incorporating standard costing principles, and describing a system giving management financial and productivity control over the whole of its contracts.

(3) The practical application of bonusing including the individual, gang and comprehensive systems.

The book will, by reason of its range, appeal to management in firms of all sizes, and should be of considerable use to Lecturers and Students in the Building Finance and Administration Courses, particularly as it is supported by a large selection of typical examination questions.

BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION AND MANAGEMENT

by C. S. DEVERELL

M.A., B.SC.(ECON.), B.COM., F.C.I.S., A.M.B.I.M.

National Productivity Year was a singularly appropriate time for the appearance of this book, the more so as recent events have underlined the need to extend the most effective methods of management to the whole of our industry and commerce. Professional associations have recognized the urgency of this matter. Nor is the recognition limited to such bodies as the British Institute of Management and the Institution of Works Managers. The importance of business administration has been stressed in the revised examination scheme of the Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, the Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, the Chartered Institute of Secretaries, and the Corporation of Secretaries. At the same time, many colleges of technology and commerce have introduced courses leading to Diplomas in Business Studies which require a knowledge of modern management techniques. University students engaged on B.Sc. Economics or similar courses are expected to acquire a sound basic understanding of the field. They, and all the students pursuing the courses mentioned here, should find the book invaluable.

INTRODUCTION TO BUSINESS COMPUTER PROGRAMMING

T. W. McRAE, C.A.

In the beginning electronic digital computers were used solely for mathematical and statistical work, and so, not unnaturally, the programming of these machines was carried out by mathematicians. The most common application of computers today is in the field of commercial data processing, but the myth that a knowledge of mathematics or even of electronics is required before one is qualified to become a programmer is hard of dying. In fact no preliminary qualifications are required for programming except perhaps a certain basic common sense.

This little book is intended for accountants, auditors, managers and others who would like to find out what programming is about. The book is not intended as a 'programmers manual' but rather as an introduction to the concept of programming and the job of the programmer.

Changing the Leopard's Spots

MUCH of the comment before and since Mr CALLAGHAN's recent tour de force has implied that the future of sterling is now largely assured – at least in the short run if not, perhaps, in the longer run. In a sense this is true; but it ascribes to the Budget measures an undue degree of effectiveness. Fiscal policy – no matter how ingenious it may be – cannot by itself effect all the long overdue adjustments within the U.K. economy which need to be made if the export targets are to be achieved.

The effectiveness of fiscal policy as a regulatory mechanism depends on the extent to which market forces are permitted to work freely and, by their effects on relative prices and incomes, ensure the distribution of resources appropriate to the needs of the economy. In Britain's economy, however, the constraints upon the market are many. They arise in the main from the multiplicity of restrictive and monopolistic practices on both sides of industry.

Superimposed upon these institutional rigidities is a continuing inflationary pressure largely attributable to the insistence that Britain should operate its economy with a smaller margin of unused resources than any other country in the world. If it is a pre-condition of any economic policy that unemployment may not exceed some 1½ per cent, then it is hardly surprising that the conventional means of re-allocating resources prove relatively ineffective. Whether Mr CALLAGHAN's Budget proves effective in maintaining the present exchange value of sterling depends not so much on the size of his 'above-the-line' surplus as on the outcome of Mr GEORGE BROWN's experiment in prices and incomes control.

With the publication of last week's White Paper, Prices and Incomes Policy (H.M.S.O., 1*s* 3*d* net), Mr BROWN has given an indication of how his policy is to be implemented. But it is no more than an indication, for the White Paper does not explain how the policy will work and merely sets out a number of principles which are to guide the two review boards – one for incomes and the other for prices – in their efforts to restrain the growth of incomes to the rate at which the national product is expected to increase, i.e. to about 3 to 3½ per cent per annum. When it is recalled that in no single year since 1951 has it proved possible to limit income increases to a figure below 4 per cent, the magnitude of the task of the two boards becomes clearer.

Labour is far from enthusiastic about the prospect of restraint: right on Mr BROWN's doorstep, the Civil Service unions have made it very clear that they have no desire to set the rest of labour an example in forbearance; Mr CYRIL PLANT, Secretary of the Inland Revenue Staff Federation, has made it even clearer that his members expect to be compensated for the extra work Mr CALLAGHAN has imposed upon them. And where does the teachers' recent 12 per cent offer fit in with Mr BROWN's scheme of things? Or is this merely to be the first of many exemptions?

The White Paper inevitably invites comparison with the efforts of Mr SELWYN LLOYD to achieve a wage freeze and his later policy of the 'guiding light'. With respect to the MINISTER OF ECONOMIC AFFAIRS, who has given unstintingly of his energies to evolve the new policy, it is somewhat difficult to discern what the real differences between his 'norms' and the former 'guiding light' are. The one major difference – and let it be conceded this could be the significant factor in the equation – is that Mr BROWN has extracted from the trade union leaders a promise of co-operation. One would feel happier about the prospect if there was evidence that the leaders are able to carry their members with them on matters of pay.

As far as the four main grounds specified in the White Paper for permitting a larger than average increase are concerned, these are so drawn that almost any claimant for exceptional treatment could make out a case. The grounds are as follows: first, where workers make a direct contribution to higher productivity; secondly, where such an award will facilitate the re-deployment of labour; thirdly, where the current pay is insufficient to ensure a reasonable standard of living; and lastly, where the pay of a particular group of workers has fallen out of line with the rates paid for comparable work and must 'in the national interest' be brought up to the higher level.

The White Paper rightly points out that not every section of the community can expect the same rate of increase. This is well known, but it would have been even more honest if the document had driven home the point that not every section of labour can expect the same annual increase. This is important because the worst feature of the annual wage round has been the insistence that once an initial increase has been agreed, then it should be granted uniformly throughout all sections of industry. The corrective to this development in a relatively free market economy, which can only re-distribute labour through the structure of wage and salary differentials, has been the growth of what the economists define as 'wage-drift'. In other words, employers have been attracting and holding such labour as they have needed by paying well above the nationally negotiated rates, often in the form of bonuses, extra overtime pay and fringe benefits.

The root cause of this state of affairs is not the militancy of the trade unions or their members; it is the willingness of employers to pay the extra rates, confident that they will be able to pass on the higher costs without difficulty to the consumer. The classical solution to this situation is a degree of deflation but, given the institutional rigidities of the times and the willingness of employers to retain under-employed labour on their books, all that such a policy has achieved is a contraction of output and lower productivity, i.e. the 'stop-go' policy with all its limitations. The obvious solution to the problem within the existing framework is somehow or other to discourage employers from bidding up the price of labour. This is what Mr BROWN's second prong, i.e. the Prices Review Board, is designed to do.

The concern which the MINISTER OF ECONOMIC AFFAIRS has displayed in rising prices is not so much a fear that rising prices will engender a new round of wage and salary increases; it is that as long as aggregate demand is kept at present levels to ensure buoyant production figures, any wage increases can and will be passed on in higher prices. If, however, industry is prevented, or at least discouraged, from adjusting their prices to every cost increase, then any such increase must be at the expense of profits. In such conditions it may be possible with the co-operation of industry to slacken the rate of increase in wages and salaries. In other words, the share of the national income going to labour will increase at the expense of the share accruing to profits.

Last Monday's announcement that the steel industry is to be permitted to raise its prices by only 12*s* 6*d* per ton and to absorb all the recent increases in the cost of fuel, labour and transport by higher productivity, is clear evidence of a policy that Mr BROWN hopes to pursue. The outlook for profits is far from happy.

Budget Developments

DURING the debate on the Budget the FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY filled in a little detail in the enormous expanse of uncertainty left by the CHANCELLOR'S speech and the accompanying Financial Statement.

The first subject he dealt with was the position of trusts in relation to the new capital gains tax. This problem can be attacked in several ways. What the Government proposes to do is to tax the trustees each time they sell one of the trust assets. If the trustees, as such, have previously bought that asset, at arm's length, and sell it at arm's length, the computation should be comparatively simple. But trustees usually acquire trust assets by voluntary disposition. Presumably when a person makes a settlement of an asset he is deemed to dispose of it at a profit if its then market value is greater than the cost to him. But who is to pay the capital gains tax then? According to the Government's shaky logic, it is the donors who make the gain. But a tax on them is hardly likely to encourage donors.

Turning now to the beneficial interest of a trust beneficiary, that, too, is an asset. Suppose the beneficiary sells his interest, after its value has risen considerably owing, for instance, to a sharp rise in the value of the underlying trust assets. The FINANCIAL SECRETARY said that such a sale would not attract capital gains tax. Suppose now that the interest of a beneficiary, instead of being sold by him, comes to an end under the terms of the trust. It may be that the trustees hold a fund on trust to pay the income to A. during the life of B. When B. dies the fund is freed from the trust in favour of A. Is this a disposal of the fund? According to the FINANCIAL SECRETARY it is; whatever logic or reason may say. Who then is to pay the capital gains tax? The answer has not so far been vouchsafed, but presumably it will be a charge on the trust fund. Happily, provisions are to be introduced to limit liability on such a disposal to once every ten years. We have already been told that death is a disposal which gives rise to a 'gain', so clearly the death of a life-tenant will also be capable of attracting tax if the fund has become more valuable while he was life-tenant.

A common feature of recent years is the discretionary settlement under which the income of a fund can be distributed among one or more of a large number of persons at discretion. The Government do not threaten capital gains tax on the death of every one of those persons; instead, there will be a kind of Government dipping into the fund once every ten years. This, of course, means a double tax on the beneficiaries. They will pay income tax and surtax on all the income as it is paid out, but in so far as such income rises so as to increase the capital value of the investments, then the trustees must realize part of the fund to pay the capital gains tax.

In his Budget speech the CHANCELLOR observed laconically that the Finance Bill would also contain provisions in regard to 'wasting assets'. This left everyone in the dark but with an even greater feeling of uncertainty. The FINANCIAL SECRETARY has now defined 'wasting assets' as:

> 'assets whose life is limited, such as leases or copyright, where the life is limited by law or contract, or assets like machinery which are inherently subject to wear and tear because of use or the passage of time'.

The Bill will contain rules the effect of which will be to treat such assets with a life of fifty years or less as being exhausted by use or enjoyment or the effluxion of time over the life of the asset. Thus, instead of taking the original cost and deducting that from the proceeds of disposal, the original cost will be written down by reference to the length of time the asset has been owned. If a person acquires as an investment a leasehold interest of which forty-nine years have still to run, he will have to pay income tax and surtax on the full rent he receives, without any deduction for the price paid for the assignment. If during the next forty-nine years he resells the leasehold, the computation of his capital gains will not allow him to deduct the full cost to him.

Capital allowances will continue to be given for assets already qualifying for them.

It has already been announced that charities and approved superannuation funds, which already enjoy exemption from income tax, are also to be free of capital gains tax. Other institutions to enjoy favourable treatment are the British Museum, friendly societies, registered trade unions, and a whole list of bodies which is to be published.

The impact of the capital gains tax on the position of London as the centre of the world's art trade has previously been touched upon. This problem has evidently given the Government second thoughts. It has resisted the plea to exempt all works of art from the charge, arguing that such an exemption would be indefensible in principle and would lead to widespread evasion. In saying this, the Government is perhaps blurring the distinction between exemptions and evasion. After all, any exemption is, in a sense, an evasion of tax which would otherwise be charged. However, where important works of art and other objects of national, scientific, historic or artistic interest change hands by gift or on a death, there is to be an exemption on the lines of the estate duty exemption conferred by section 40 of the Finance Act, 1930, as amended. An undertaking has to be given to keep the pictures etc. in the United Kingdom, to see to their preservation, and to give facilities for viewing. If they are sold by private treaty to certain institutions, the proceeds are equally not chargeable to duty.

The CHANCELLOR had a good deal to say in his Budget speech about double tax relief in the context of the balance of payments problem. He expressed a wish to go some way towards correcting what he called a bias in the tax system in favour of overseas, as compared with domestic, investment. In the first place, where an overseas company pays overseas tax and then out of its net profit remits a dividend to a United Kingdom investor, that investor is not to be given relief in respect of the underlying overseas tax; unless he is a company owning at least 25 per cent of the issued capital of the overseas company. Although there is unilateral relief under this head, a great deal of the total relief is given pursuant to conventions made with overseas Governments, and these will have to be re-negotiated before the change can take place. It would seem that in relation to Commonwealth countries even the unilateral relief under this head is not to be withdrawn yet. Whether other countries will complain of discrimination (a word much used in these days) remains to be seen.

A United Kingdom company may pay a dividend out of profits which include an element of overseas income, such income having borne overseas tax in one form or another. Hitherto the shareholder has been able to claim double tax relief in respect of this 'overspill', but this relief is to come to an end. The termination has its own logic in the context of the new corporation tax, where shareholders in a U.K. company receive no relief in respect of the corporation tax paid by the company to the United Kingdom Exchequer. However, the CHANCELLOR recognizes that the sudden withdrawal of the relief (on reliance of which so many shareholders have acquired those particular shares) might cause hardship, as where a company drastically reduced its dividends in order to maintain the customary proportion of its profits put to reserve. To meet this situation the CHANCELLOR proposes to make cash payments in a transitional period to the companies affected. These payments will be related to past performance and, after tapering off, will disappear after 1970–71. Overseas trade corporations will cease to qualify for special treatment after April 5th, 1966.

The new capital gains tax is to apply not only to residents in the United Kingdom but also to persons who, while not actually resident for the year of charge, are ordinarily resident for that year. The FINANCIAL SECRETARY filled in some of the gaps left by the Budget statement. It is apparently intended that if the person is not also domiciled here he will not be chargeable to tax on realizations of assets overseas.

The debate on the Budget resolutions was concluded on Monday after some dark hints by the Chief Secretary as to the taxation of companies which either do not distribute at all, or distribute in a manner hitherto not taxable.

One more word might be said about the Budget. The new corporation tax combined with taxation of dividends rests on the theory that the shareholders of a company – individually and collectively – do not bear the corporation tax; hence they must also pay income tax and surtax on their dividends. However, when arguing that winners of football prizes were, in fact, taxed on their winnings, the FINANCIAL SECRETARY used the argument that the tax at present levied on the stake money of all the participants was levied on the sum paid to the winner.

Accounts for Every Occasion

THE investor who acquires his shares at too high a price or the shareholder who disposes of his at too low a price may both be basing their miscalculations on the same data – namely, the latest available financial accounts of the company whose shares are being bought and sold. Now if the two individuals are of equal shrewdness, or are equally well advised, may there not be some flaw in the manner of presentation of the common source of information? Similarly, the economist may form quite different views on the asset strength or earning potential of the same company from those held by, say, a lending banker. Here again, is this not an instance where two intelligent persons may have argued impeccably from the same premises to widely diverging conclusions?

This alleged lack of 'certainty' in accounting data was the subject of a stimulating lecture given recently by Professor A. S. CARRINGTON, of the University of Canterbury in New Zealand, which we are reproducing in this and next week's issues. His contention is, briefly, that the conventions of present-day accounting – examples of which are insistence on the use of historical costs, conservatism in crediting income and a disinclination to allow for price level fluctuations – do not in their application adequately reflect conditions with which businesses have to contend.

The point was scarcely relevant in the earliest days of accounting when the subject-matter – lists of cash movements, debts and assets – was entirely factual; nor even at a later stage in the development of the profession when the striking of the balance of profit or loss could be deferred until each separate trading venture had been completed. Nowadays, however, the business enterprise is a complicated and continuous entity. Financial accounts have to be prepared for arbitrary and often artificial (in relation to its cycle of activities) periods of time and problems of allocation, apportionment and valuation on occasion vitiate their realism and accuracy.

Professor CARRINGTON is thus led to the conclusion that because of inadequate techniques and a certain lack of imagination in approach, modern accounting does not fully achieve its aims. He advocates that fulfilment lies not in the present more or less standard form of financial statement, but rather in the evolution of a range of statements each designed for a specific purpose. At one extreme might be the 'cash basis' accounting model recognizing 'only actual, past cash flows as transactions'. At the other would be a historical-cost, accrual accounting model 'with cost-based adjustment for depreciation'. Between these would be a tax accounting model; one in which historical cost and accrual accounting conventions would be leavened by 'managerial judgment' where depreciation, stock values and provisions were concerned; and yet another incorporating index number adjustments to reflect price level changes.

In presenting his case, Professor CARRINGTON is aware of the objections which might be raised to such a radical departure from the single, multi-purpose form of financial accounts everyone has come to accept. Public confidence might be undermined by a sudden proliferation of varied statements; increased flexibility of treatment and the consequent loss of objectivity might facilitate tax evasion; auditors would be asked to express opinions on several accounting results for the same period; and systems would become more complex and costly. To all of these and others he gives reasoned answers, arguing that the practical needs of the business community must come first and that difficulties in the way of meeting them must be overcome. He frankly admits that the proposals he puts forward are not new but have already been discussed at length. His justification for raising them again is that, in his opinion, effective solutions have not so far been forthcoming and, indeed, that some of the efforts to find them may be misdirected.

Accountants everywhere, even if they do not agree with him, should be grateful to Professor CARRINGTON for marshalling so skilfully the arguments for diversity in a science which seems to be moving ever closer towards uniformity. His lecture is certain to be widely quoted and because of this, we venture one suggestion. An appendix giving a range of practical examples derived from one basic set of figures and hypotheses would help immensely to illustrate his thesis.

The New Rent Bill

by T. J. SOPHIAN

BESIDES the private landlord, many members of the profession – accountants and secretaries of property companies, for instance, as well as those engaged in an advisory capacity – must now take stock of the new situation that will arise when the new Rent Bill, recently given an unopposed second reading in Parliament, comes into operation. The policy of the Government has been to reimpose and extend control on rented property, and to take swift action in the matter. Although technically the new classes of tenant to be brought within the scope of the Rent Act may not yet be entitled to its benefits, a measure of protection has nevertheless been effectively conferred on them in the meantime by the Protection from Eviction Act, 1964.

But for this Act tenants who were, and indeed still are, outside control because the rateable values of their houses, flats, or even rooms, were, as at November 7th, 1956, beyond the limits of £40 in London and Scotland, and £30 elsewhere, could be evicted on the termination of their contractual tenancies; nor would the Courts have been able to suspend the order for possession beyond a period of about a month.

Protection of 1964 Act

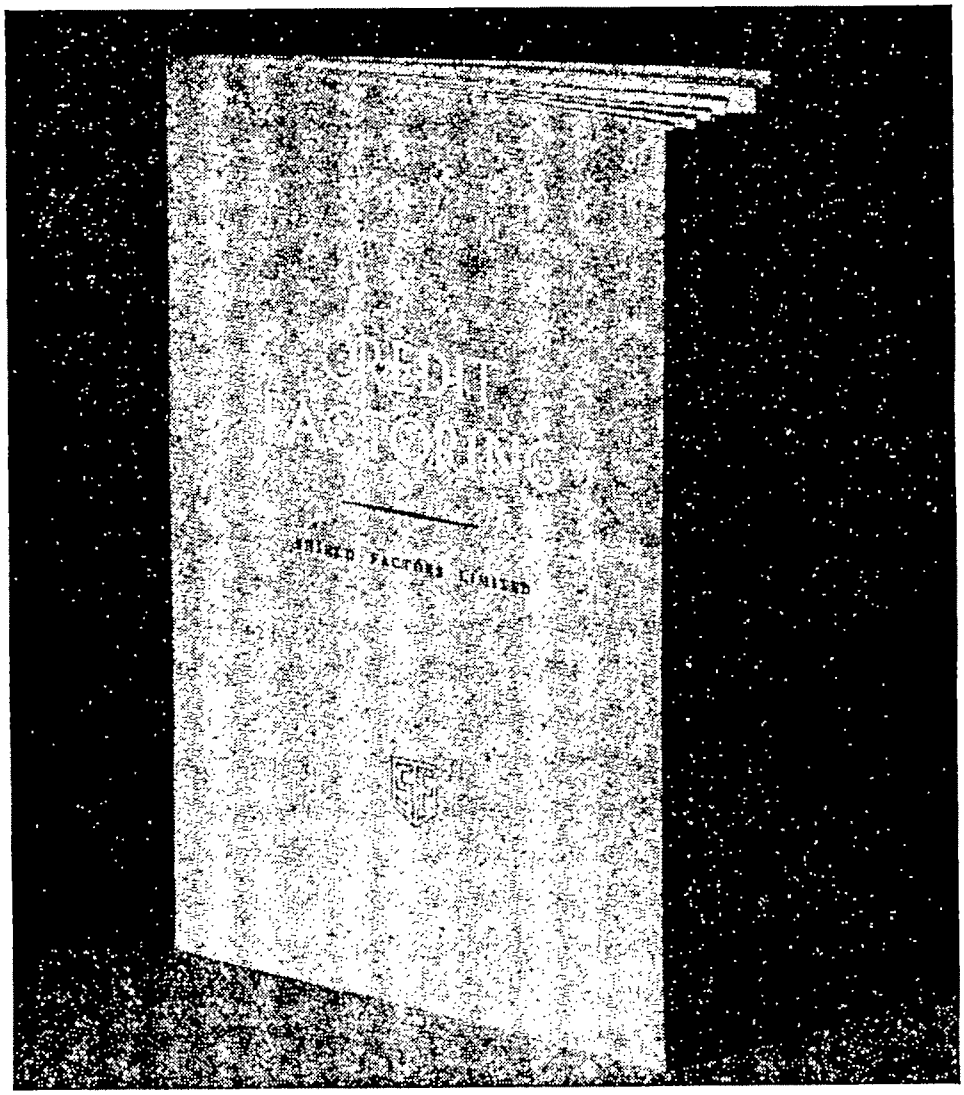
These tenants, however, have been brought under the 'umbrella' of the Act of 1964. Although he might, under the ordinary law, be clearly entitled to possession, the landlord nevertheless may not evict the tenant unless he has obtained an order for possession from the County Court; and under the terms of the Act the Court has the power to suspend the order for possession for a period of up to twelve months. This power is now likely to be increasingly exercised against the landlord because of the new Rent Bill. The Act of 1964 bridges the gap until the enactment of the Rent Bill under which the tenant of the controlled property enjoys full protection.

It is noteworthy that the only Court which, in effect, is entitled to make an order for possession under the 1964 Act is a County Court. Though proceedings for possession may still be instituted in the High Court, they will be remitted to the County Court since the High Court is powerless to grant a suspension of the kind envisaged by the 1964 Act.

The major proposals in the new Rent Bill relate to the extent of control, the right to increase rent, and the right to possession. As regards the extent of control, it is necessary to ascertain what properties might still be controlled and how decontrol may be effected under the 1957 Rent Act.

That Act curtailed the extent of control by reducing the amount of the net rateable value for the purpose of control from £100 in London, £90 in Scotland and £75 elsewhere, to £40 in London and Scotland, and £30 elsewhere; the material time for the purpose of ascertaining this rateable value being November 7th, 1956.

If, therefore, a 'dwelling-house', which definition embraces a house, flat, or even a room or rooms, at November 7th, 1956, had a rateable value in excess of £40, it was decontrolled, as from October 6th, 1958. All that was necessary was the service by the landlord of the appropriate notice required by paragraph 2 of the Fourth Schedule of the 1957 Act.



Moreover dwelling-houses which because of their lower rateable value continued to be controlled, automatically became decontrolled upon the grant of a new tenancy to a new tenant.

The contrast in the position of controlled and decontrolled dwelling-houses since the 1957 Act has been considerable. For instance, a tenant of a dwelling-house of a net rateable value (as at November 7th, 1956) in London of £39, paying in 1957 a rent of, say, £100 per annum, would not be paying much more at the present time; on the other hand, another tenant of a similar house rated at £41 might now find that the rent he has to pay is in the region of £400.

In substance, all tenants (subject to minor exceptions) who were controlled prior to the 1957 Act because the rateable values of their homes were within the higher limits of £100, £90 and £30, respectively, will be brought back into control when the new Bill becomes law.

Further, control will be extended to cover dwelling-houses with a rateable value of up to £400 in London and £200 elsewhere. Thus, houses at present commanding a rent even as high as £1,000 per annum may be brought within the scope of the new Act. Such protection will also extend to a dwelling-house which forms a sublet part of a shop or of trade or business premises.

Newly-erected and converted premises were taken out of control by section 35 of the Housing Repairs and Rents Act of 1954. Such houses will also lose their privileges and, ceteris paribus, be brought into control. Again, existing controlled tenancies of derequisitioned dwellings which were due to be freed from control on March 31st, 1966, will continue to be controlled.

At the same time the new Bill provides for some elasticity in the extent of control, for the Minister is empowered to reduce by order the limits of rateable value necessary for control, either generally or in such areas as he may consider to be suitable for this purpose. If, therefore, in a particular area, housing development has caught up with the need for houses, a certain measure of decontrol may be introduced by the exercise of the Minister's discretionary powers.

Houses let by local and other public authorities, however, will remain outside control under the proposed new Act and such authorities will continue to be entitled to bring summary proceedings in Magistrates Courts for recovery of possession.

Rent Limits

Certain rent limits will apply and these limits will be determined in general by a variable formula.

Where, at the date of the commencement of the new Act, a 'dwelling-house' is already let, the rent limit will be the original rent payable under the lease or agreement creating the tenancy; if that original rent has since been varied by an agreement made before the new Act, it will be the varied rent.

This could give rise to a position such as the following: a lease has come to an end on March 25th, 1965, the rent payable being, say, £150 per annum exclusive of rates; the landlord desires to increase the rent to £300, but the tenant refuses to pay the increase and continues in occupation. The landlord may take proceedings before the 1965 Act to recover possession and obtain an order which, however, is suspended under the Protection from Eviction Act. When the 1965 Act comes into operation the tenant may apply to the Court to have the order rescinded or varied. In such circumstances, however, a curious situation may arise. As the tenant has not agreed to the variation of the rent before the 1965 Act came into operation and has not, in fact, agreed to the variation at all, it would appear that the landlord will be debarred from recovering more than the original rent of £150 per annum under the new controlled tenancy which will have arisen.

The new Bill proposes to introduce an entirely new scheme for the fixing of fair rents of which advantage may be taken by either the landlord or the tenant. An important feature of this scheme is the registration of the 'fair rent'. Once a rent is registered, no application for its alteration will be entertained at the instance of either the landlord or the tenant individually.

The landlord or tenant may agree the rent which should be registered. If they cannot agree, rent officers to be appointed under the Act by local authorities will step in to assist the parties, if possible, to reach agreement. If that fails, the matter will be referred to a local rent assessment committee. These committees will be appointed by the Minister and will constitute a local rent tribunal from whose decision there will be no appeal except on a point of law.

Rents thus fixed through the aegis of the rent officers or by the rent assessment committees will be likewise registered. This procedure will apply equally to the rents of new houses. Moreover, where the building, conversion or improvement of houses is contemplated, the landlord would be well advised to obtain, before the execution of the work, a certificate of what is to be regarded as a fair rent. This certificate can then be registered and the certified rent will remain in force without risk of challenge during the next three years.

What is a Fair Rent?

The Bill sets a problem as to the determination of what constitutes a 'fair rent'. Consideration must be taken of all the circumstances, including in particular the age, character, locality and state of repair of the house; but additionally, any inflation of the rent due to scarcity of dwellings in the area must be discounted. It is this latter factor which is likely to raise considerable problems. It could be argued, for instance, that it might be necessary to go back to the position of rents immediately before the outbreak of the Second World War. The war period must obviously be excluded since in some areas, such as London, accommodation was anything but scarce and rents were unduly low.

Immediately after the end of the Second World War scarcity began to raise its ugly head, having regard in particular to the considerable extent of war damage. The country has never seemed to recover from this situation and rebuilding – no matter how it has been stepped up – has been unable to satisfy demand. The proof lies in the enormous rents, when compared with pre-war rents, which can now be demanded and obtained.

But although one may start with a 1939 rent value basis, it is quite obvious that increased rents must be allowed because of such factors as the depreciation of the £ and inflation as well as the tremendous increases in the cost of labour and materials. One can only conjecture as to the adjustments which will have to be made for these reasons. The determination of such questions must ultimately rest with valuers who are well acquainted with property values in their particular areas.

Recovery of Possession

What are the rights of a landlord to recover possession from a protected tenant, under the new legislation?

The Bill, inter alia, introduces an entirely new principle affecting all tenancies of dwelling-houses whatever their rateable value, irrespective of whether the tenancy is an unfurnished or a furnished one, and whether or not the rent is inclusive of services. A landlord will be prohibited from enforcing any right to possession of the premises except by taking proceedings in Court. Where the rateable value of the house is within the £400 limit, the proceedings must be brought in a County Court; in other cases the High Court would be the appropriate tribunal. The grounds of action are similar to, though not entirely identical with, the grounds obtaining at present for possession of premises controlled under existing legislation.

The only case where the landlord may take possession without going to Court is where the tenant has ceased to reside in any part of the premises.

After Dinner Story

by RONALD SHERBROOKE-WALKER, C.B.E., T.D., D.L., F.C.A.

IT had been a heavy day at the office. An unusually large morning mail, a fussy client nervous about his income tax, an annual general meeting and lunch with the directors afterwards with too much to eat and drink, a new client who called in the afternoon and went on and on, and finally, as I was leaving the office, my secretary chose that of all moments to announce that she was getting married soon and going to live in the north of England. Why must good secretaries who know all your work get married and go and live in the north of England? There ought to be a law against it.

Time for Relaxation

After I had got home and with a couple of dry martinis inside me, I felt better; and dinner over, I was going off to my study but my wife spotted my bulging brief case and made me promise to leave it alone that night. 'It can all wait until tomorrow – read a book and forget the office for a few hours.' Like a good husband, I gathered up the unconsumed portion of the day's Times, last week's Accountant and a James Bond which hitherto had escaped my attention, and settled down in my armchair by the fire. Scamp followed me in and lay down with a sigh by my chair. What had he got to sigh about?

I finished off The Times, duly digested The Accountant and was reaching out for the James Bond when I fell a'musing. Why is money . . .? Why am I an accountant? Why . . . .

Money Matters

'This is the first of the series of talks to Senior School', the headmaster's strong voice was ringing out, 'which, you will remember, I told you about at the end of last term. The talks will all be on topics outside the ordinary school curriculum (sighs of relief from the body of the hall). Many of you will be leaving at the end of this term and you will find it a good thing to take your minds off examination matters once a week and turn them towards some of the problems which you will meet when you are out in the world on your own. Mr Balance is a well-known chartered accountant and he has very kindly given up the time out of his busy life to come and talk to us on a subject which will interest us all – MONEY (grins and restrained guffaws). Mr Balance.'

Heaven help me, there I was on my feet in Big School looking over a sea of upturned young faces and facing the most critical of audiences in the world. Anyway it was too late to get out of it now; no telephone could ring; no secretary could appear at the door demanding my presence outside so that I could flee the place. I must do my best, off the cuff.

'Your headmaster is right – headmasters always are – (laughter) – money is a very important and interesting subject to all of us. There must be thousands of books on the subject, all of which you have no doubt read, but time is short and I am going to deal with only one aspect and you may agree it's the most important. How to handle the stuff when you get it.'

'But first, what is money? My dictionary puts it rather well; they can if they try, you know. "Any piece of metal, stamped by public authority, and used as the medium of exchange". Fair enough, but why do we want "a medium of exchange"? Because the barter of bygone days would be a bit tricky now. If there was no money how would you buy a transistor? Suppose the money was a present from a rich uncle and he was a solicitor. What could he give the transistor salesman in exchange? Free legal advice for a year?

'How would I pay my dentist? Do his income tax for him for one year against two teeth hauled out, or two years for one extraction and five fillings? Where there would really be some fun would be over your school fees. Imagine the size of the tithe barn which the school would have to build to house the bottles of whisky, the tins of cigarettes, the motor-cars, the steel billets and all the products of your parents' toil. And how would those of your fathers who are clergymen, civil servants and insurance officials settle the school bills? I am sure the headmaster is with me here! (Smiles from those still awake.)

Management Problem

'So we see what money is, in this sense, and why it is necessary; but let's look at it for a few minutes in a broader way – not as a token, but as what it really is – a very important thing in our lives.

'When you leave school you'll have to earn your living. You'll be underpaid, whatever you do. We all are and we have to get used to it. What is all important to your happiness and comfort is the way you manage the money you get. And it is important, too, to your relations and friends. We all know fellows who are always in the red – they are a menace to other people. We avoid them when we see them coming, ogling for a loan. (Sympathetic grins.) They survive somehow but in spite of the acts they put on they're not happy people. There are many reasons why – they may be extravagant or over-optimistic or just lacking in common sense. But lots of people are none of these and yet they always seem to find it difficult to keep on an even keel financially. This is usually because they never really learn the difference between "receipts and payments" and "income and expenditure". If you forget everything else remember this difference. I'll give you examples of what I mean.

Gilt off the Gingerbread

'A.'s got a job with a good salary for his age and he's paid monthly but, of course, by the time Pay-as-you-earn income tax and National Insurance have been taken off, his monthly cheque has lost quite a bit of the gilt off the gingerbread. He doesn't plan his finances ahead and as soon as the cheque's in his pocket he thinks he's rich and starts to spend it on things he can't afford. He forgets that while he was earning that money he was running up debts – the rent of his flat, gas, electricity, and all the things for which the bills come in – perhaps months after he's had them and used them. He makes no saving for the new clothes he has to get from time to time, for annual subscriptions, holidays, presents and all the things that come along in a lump for payment, but the provision for which should really have been spread over the year. He's a "receipts and payments" man and he'll have an unhappy time until he learns better.

'Now for B., with wings sprouting out of his shoulders and a halo on his head. He's got the same salary but he's an "income and expenditure" man. He reckons up what his annual income will be after those horrid deductions and he estimates his expenditure for the year, including the inevitable bills which accrue over the much longer period than the receipt of his monthly pay cheque. Having done this he fixes his standard of living and lives happily ever after.

This is the nub of the thing and while I'm being serious there's one more thing I want to say before I finish. . . .'

Something cold and damp was thrusting itself urgently into my hand dangling over the arm of the chair. Scamp felt he had waited long enough for his nightly walk.

'Certainty' or Realism in Accounting - I

by A. S. CARRINGTON
Professor of Accountancy, University of Canterbury

'Accounting can rise no higher in the scale of certainty than the events which it reflects.'
Geo. O. May.

1. Introduction

IN recent years accounting has been the target for increasing criticism from a variety of sources. Accounting theorists have deplored the lack of any cohesive theoretical structure. Thus R. J. Chambers argues 'that many of the practical imperfections of existing methods arise from makeshift devices adopted in the absence of a consistent theory of accounting'.[1] Economists complain of unrealistic assumptions. Edwards and Bell, for example, consider that '. . . these obviously unreal assumptions of accounting eliminate that which it has set out to measure'.[2] The investing public, too, has had occasion to wonder about the value of published accounts, which, in some cases, have assisted the more predatory take-over bidder at the expense of shareholders, and which in others have failed to reveal impending financial disaster until too late. Their view was expressed by R. K. Yorston at the Jubilee Convention of the New Zealand Society when he said:

> 'The annual financial report of a company should provide enough data upon which to base an opinion as to the wisdom, or otherwise, of investment in the company. Shareholders are entitled to query whether they have been in the confidence of the Board and have had adequate disclosure made to them when they receive a "take-over" bid from another company of an amount considerably in advance of the figure at which the shares have been selling on the market.'[3]

Managements, also, have expressed their dissatisfaction with accounting in various ways – by ignoring the accounts, by 'going behind them for the real facts', or, in increasing numbers, by employing other more sophisticated quantitative techniques as primary aids to decision-making. Two comments are sufficient to illustrate the seriousness of this challenge. Dr F. J. Bromilow, an Australian scientist engaged in commercial applications of operations research, recently stated:

> 'Cost data is normally not immediately available in suitable form nor with suitable content, and it is not always easy to convince accountants unfamiliar with these concepts why some different content is essential. . . . It is so serious in a number of organizations that it has been found necessary to engage special groups independent of the normal accounting departments to search out and present cost data with proper content for O.R. (operations research) studies because the normal accounting departments did not adapt themselves to the changed ideas.'[4]

A similar view was expressed in America by Henderson and Schlaifer in these terms –

> 'In some situations the need for looking at the effect of a proposed action on overall profits rather than at its accounting cost or profit is perfectly clear. . . . In other situations by contrast accounting cost is really misleading in arriving at a sound decision, and it is easy to overlook this fact.'[5]

At first sight there appears to be little common ground among these various criticisms. The theoretician regards accounting as too pragmatic and lacking in consistency, while many business managers and executives take an opposite view – that the procedures are too rigid and make insufficient allowance for particular situations. The economist, as well as many accountants, is concerned about the scant regard for the future involved in such accounting concepts as 'profit' or 'asset values' and the failure to distinguish between 'real' and 'monetary' values. In general he tends to favour a greater emphasis on subjective judgment as a corrective measure. As Canning said, 'The ultimate concern of the economist is with the subjective appreciation of income'.[6] The investor may share the view that 'real' values should be recognized in accounting statements, but he is also likely to criticize the wide discretion available within the limits of accepted accounting practices in the determination of income and of balance sheet values – particularly when the disparity between current values and accounting figures becomes great.

Although the volume of critical comment has served to stimulate efforts to improve accounting theory and practice, it can be readily appreciated that the diversity of criticism has tended to complicate the task. It is useful to ask, therefore, whether the variety of shortcomings is more apparent than real. Is there perhaps some single basic defect which makes accounting vulnerable simultaneously to so many different challenges? It will be the purpose of this paper to explore that possibility and to advance a case for isolating one particular characteristic as the primary cause of the main areas of dissatisfaction with accounting in its present form. If such a case can be established, it is of some significance since efforts to improve accounting may be rendered more effective if concentrated upon the elimination of the defective feature.

This 1964 Invitation Lecture of the New Zealand Society of Accountants was delivered at Auckland University on October 15th, 1964. Our reproduction of the paper, undertaken with the approval of the author and the Society, will be completed in next week's issue.

The particular characteristic of accounting which will be challenged is that of 'certainty'. This refers to the widespread, indeed almost universal, view that accounting does, or alternatively can, produce figures – for profit and for balance sheet values – which are valid and correct in the sense that they are better, or show a fairer view, for every normal purpose, than any alternative set of results based on the same activities. Some practitioners would accept that any sufficiently well designed and carefully operated system can and does achieve this result. Other accountants, notably writers on accounting theory, suggest that such a result is conceptually possible, but can be achieved only by instituting various modifications in the basis of accounting – price level adjustments, current valuations and so forth. The former, less sophisticated, view probably predominates, but both groups in general appear to agree that at least it is possible to produce a particular 'best' set of results, which is superior to any alternative set applying to the same entity in the same time period. Indeed it is widely regarded as a major advantage of accounting, if not almost a 'sacred' attribute, that it can be relied upon to produce a single 'right' result. This assumption is so basic that it has received relatively little attention, although Oswald W. Knouth, writing in the Journal of Accountancy for January 1957, did comment on the 'reputation for infallibility possessed by accounting'. Edwards and Bell[1] in outlining the necessary assumptions to establish the validity of accounting, say:

> 'Certainty assumption – it must be assumed that the future is known to the firm for certain. Only then can the allocation of costs and revenues among past, present, and future periods be certain. This is necessary if the operations of a continuing firm are to be measured accurately for fiscal periods.'

It is not suggested that accountants do subscribe to the idea that the future is certain, but rather that in accepting, and even defending, a single set of accounting results, they act as though it were.

2. 'Certainty' – the Historical Background

It may be an oversimplification, but not necessarily an unfair one, to describe the history of accounting as representing consistent attempts to create, in a world beset by uncertainty and change, a structure which could be depended upon to yield a single, certain and unequivocal answer.

The means by which this delicate and somewhat artificial structure has been sheltered from the unpredictable eventualities of the real world have varied over time. Nevertheless the tendency to seek certainty has been a pervasive one. This search, in fact, may have deep psychological roots, as suggested by a former president of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, M. G. Eaton, in these words: 'Much of the demand for uniformity in accounting is based on a wish for unattainable certainty in man's financial affairs'.[2]

Prior to the Renaissance and the development of double-entry book-keeping, business needs appear to have been met adequately by a systematic record of cash movements, of obligations due to or from other parties, and of assets held. The subject-matter was entirely factual, in a historical sense, and no problems of uncertainty arose. Even at the next stage of development, from the fourteenth century on, when ascertainment of the profit of trading ventures was required, attention was confined to past, factual data in preparing accounts. This was achieved by delaying preparation of accounting results until completion of the particular venture. In such cases the problem of uncertainty was avoided by the use of an accounting period which today would be regarded as inconveniently long. It is well to remember that uncertainty arises mainly because interim results are needed during the currency of an undertaking. When the life of an enterprise has terminated, it is possible to determine precisely, at least in money terms, the net effect of all the activities undertaken during its existence. Company liquidations and completely distributed estates provide examples of such circumstances. Sprouse and Moonitz in their recent research report on accounting principles[3] explained the position as follows:

> 'The earning process is a continuous one, taking place over the entire life of a business enterprise. The need for interim measurements during the life of the enterprise leads to the use of relatively short accounting periods such as the year. Inevitably, this means that allocations between past, present, and future periods must be made and, as a result, measurements of profit during short periods of time are tentative.'

With the advent of continuing business enterprises, in particular joint stock companies, and the need for periodic income determination, those concerned with preparing or using accounting information were faced with the uncertainties, familiar today, involved in such matters as valuing unsold inventories and depreciating fixed assets. There arose a new means of achieving certainty – the use of extreme conservatism. Creation of secret reserves by under-valuing stock or fixed assets; refusal to recognize revenue as readily as expense; even use of the 'lower of cost or market value' rule – all contributed to a sort of negative certainty. Although accounting results could no longer be certain in the sense of being based on past events, at least it was possible to assume that future benefits had been so severely discounted that the actual situation would prove to be no worse than, or at least as favourable as, that shown by the accounts. As Yamey said of this period: 'The practice of the "secret reserve" is merely the most obvious illustration of the tendency for the statement of profits in published accounts to be conditioned by managements' ideas on how the interests of their companies were best served'.[1] The conflict between certainty and realism was becoming apparent.

During the past thirty years, as over-conservatism has become discredited as an acceptable practice, the trend has been towards a more subtle protection of the accounting figures from the fact of uncertainty. There has been an increasing tendency for accountants to admit – usually as a last resort – that their figures do not pretend to give a realistic view of asset values; or even, therefore, of profits. Nevertheless it is claimed that the accounting figures are useful because they are 'consistent', 'objective', 'true and fair', or 'arrived at in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles'. Thus a committee of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants said in 1948:

> '. . . it does not seem to the committee that such action (restatement of all assets in terms of the depreciated currency) should be recommended now if financial statements are to have maximum usefulness to the greatest number of users', although it went on to say:

> 'The committee recognizes that the common forms of financial statement may permit misunderstanding as to the amount which a corporation has available for distribution in the form of dividends, higher wages or lower prices for the company's products.'[2]

In somewhat similar vein, the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in a pronouncement on price level adjustments, stated:

> 'In consequence, the results shown by accounts prepared on the basis of historical cost are not a measure of purchasing power; nor do the results necessarily represent the amount which can prudently be regarded as available for distribution, having regard to the financial requirements of the business. Similarly, the results shown by such accounts are not necessarily suitable for purposes such as price fixing, wage negotiations, and taxation, unless in using them for these purposes due regard is paid to the amount of profit which has been retained in the business for its maintenance.'[3]

Nevertheless, the Council recommended, on the grounds that 'the alternatives to historical cost appear to have serious defects and . . . raise social and economic issues going far beyond the realm of accountancy', that historical cost should continue as the basis for preparation of annual accounts and computation of profit.

Almost certainly these official opinions can be taken to reflect majority opinion within the accounting profession, notwithstanding the existence of a vigorous and probably growing band of dissentients challenging the status quo. Thus accounting has been protected from the need to face reality by claims that its admittedly unrealistic structure is more reliable, more consistent and thus better, than any alternative system. These claims are made despite the fact that fixed asset values may represent acquisition cost – recent or remote, revaluation, or some arbitrary inter-company transfer value; that depreciation may be based on managerial judgment, on arbitrary tax-approved rates, on revised provision after revaluation, and may be inclusive or exclusive of initial or special depreciation allowances – and so forth. That the treatment of inventory valuation provides even greater scope for variation hardly requires comment. Then too, the range of possible treatments available in preparing the consolidated accounts of a group which has taken over subsidiaries by the issue of its own shares is impressive, to say the least. The list of areas in which the idea of an objective and generally accepted treatment breaks down completely could be extended at considerable length. This surely makes mockery of the conventional defence of accounting.

3. 'Traditional' Accounting – Should it be Retained?

It is obvious from even a cursory study of the accepted conventions or postulates of accounting that, in its normal modern application, accounting does not seek to cope with uncertainty, in the sense of the unpredictability of future events. Use of historical costs; conservatism in recognition of income; disregard of price level changes; all these create a system or 'model' from which the future is excluded under the assumption of 'continuity'. The term 'model' is used here in the normal sense in which it is employed in the social sciences generally, namely, a symbolic representation of actual operations or activities, simplified by abstracting from the less important aspects of the real situation by means of appropriate assumptions, so that attention can be focused on the behaviour of, and interrelations among, the more important factors. The term is introduced deliberately because there is some importance in the realization that an accounting system is a classic example of a quantitative model. The nature of such a system or model, for example, the factors to be studied and those to be excluded, is determined by the basic assumptions, together with the accounting classification and the procedural rules adopted.

A model, as defined, is a useful tool of thought and analysis, since it provides a framework within which to consider the influence and repercussion of various interrelated factors. Furthermore, the nature of a model may readily be changed, by appropriate alteration of the basic assumptions, to yield a new model if it is anticipated that this will yield additional or more useful information. It is important to realize that the only justification for the existence of any model is the utility of the information or knowledge it serves to produce. Thus if a model ceases to be useful there is no logical reason for its retention – it possesses no inherent validity or value.

The question usually asked when conventional or 'traditional' accounting is challenged is whether this model is acceptable, or whether it should be replaced by another, more realistic – perhaps based on current valuations, or on adjustments for price level shifts, or both. When the question is thus posed as an 'either-or' choice it is not too difficult for supporters of the status quo to show that much of value would be lost by abandoning historical or traditional accounting. It is quite clear that for many purposes a relatively rigid model, with the highest possible degree of objectivity, is desirable. This applies when the use for which the accounts are primarily intended makes even an arbitrarily achieved 'certainty' preferable to a more realistic result, as for example in tax-accounting, trusts and other situations dominated by legal considerations. Nevertheless, such a defence of traditional accounting is inconclusive. The fault here lies in failure to recognize the range of choice available to accountants. A more relevant question than whether traditional accounting should be superseded is – 'should there be only one "recognized" set of accounting figures?'

There are two major disadvantages of the currently accepted or traditional model of accounting at which criticism may fairly be levelled. First, it is an ill-defined model which is too rigid for some purposes and insufficiently rigid for others. For many normal business decisions, both by investors and by managements, accounting yields information which can be irrelevant or even misleading because of exclusion of most changes in value of assets until they have been 'realized'. Sprouse and Moonitz comment:

> 'As long as certain kinds of changes are ignored, even though the evidence is there, financial accounting will continue to be exposed to the risk of serving merely to validate policies as to distributability or taxability of earnings . . .'[1]

Likewise Edwards and Bell state that:

> 'Too frequently in our opinion the objectivity principle is used as a means of excluding subjective judgment from accounting decisions without regard for the effect this exclusion may have on the decision-making process of the firm as a whole. If in order to adhere as strictly as possible to the objectivity principle, the accounting department reduces the usefulness of the accounting data furnished to management, managerial efficiency will be adversely affected.'[2]

It is unnecessary to elaborate on the case which has been made by many eminent writers for recognition of price level changes or for changes in the value of particular assets. As the recent A.I.C.P.A. Research Study on price level changes concisely says:

> 'In a nutshell, financial data adjusted for price level effects provide a basis for a more intelligent, better informed allocation of resources, whether these resources are in the hands of individuals, of business entities, or of government.'[3]

As the traditional accounting model excludes adjustments of this sort, and most of those relating to specific price changes, it may fairly be regarded as too rigid for use in decisions where such information is relevant. At the same time it will be remembered that reference has already been made to the wide range of accepted practices in matters such as depreciation, inventory valuation and consolidation of group accounts. The considerable scope for manoeuvre which this affords is generally regarded as legitimate in the preparation of conventional accounting statements. Unfortunately, although there has been a steady trend towards better disclosure over recent years, it is still far from effective general practice to give a full and clear disclosure of the basis upon which accounts have been prepared. Certainly some major aspects, such as revaluation of fixed assets, are customarily revealed. Many others, including treatment of depreciation on revalued assets, existence of long-term leases, basis of inclusion of intangible assets, extent of revaluation of inventories below cost, treatment of intra-group activities and a host of further items of some significance, are shrouded in mystery for the outside observer. Thus the user of accounting statements in such circumstances suffers both ways – from a deliberate artificiality in some aspects and from an unknown degree of flexibility of judgment and method in others.

This disadvantage is compounded by a second failing; that the accepted or traditional accounting model is monopolistic, in the sense that it is generally regarded as the only true model of financial position and progress. There is a reluctance on the part of accountants in general to countenance the offering of 'competitive' information which would cast any doubt on the exclusive validity of the accounting results. Too often even such information as a note of the market value of investments is provided only with reluctance, while on the matter of price level adjustments Carman G. Blough comments that:

> 'even with the encouragement given to furnish supplementary information as to the effect of such changes on financial statements which was contained in the Accounting Research Bulletins of the A.I.C.P.A.'s committee on accounting procedure and in the statements of the American Accounting Association's Committee on Concepts and Standards, the number of companies that have evidenced any interest in following the proposal could be counted on the fingers of one hand.'[1]

The conclusion seems inescapable that although traditional accounting contains sufficient of value to rule out its complete rejection, the restrictive scope, the ill-defined and often undisclosed divergencies of treatment and the strong tendency to exclude alternative information, together constitute a considerable barrier to the attainment of the full potential value of accounting. (To be concluded.)

ENCOURAGING EXPORTS

WHILE the Budget and the prices and incomes policy have made the headlines during the past week, the Government has also taken some further steps to encourage exports. These were announced by the President of the Board of Trade last week and take the form of improved export credit arrangements and proposals for giving particular facilities in the national interest to exporters. The Government has promised to make new efforts to simplify documentation and ease the paperwork of exporters and is raising the standard minimum percentage of insurance cover provided by the Export Credits Guarantee Department from 85 per cent to 90 per cent.

In addition the system of bank guarantee carrying 5½ per cent fixed interest rate will be extended to credits down to two years, instead of three years as formerly, while the charge for the bank guarantee will be reduced by 50 per cent. The proportion of credit normally covered by the bank guarantee will be raised from 90 to 100 per cent, with the additional effect of extending the scope of the 5½ per cent interest rate.

These measures still do not constitute an export policy, but may prove an encouragement to the small company making its first efforts to export. They may also go some way to offset the burden of generally higher credit costs.

STEEL PRICES

WHILE the timing of this week's announcement of higher steel prices may seem unfortunate since it follows so closely the publication of the White Paper dealing with prices and incomes, it would seem that the Iron and Steel Board have clearly been guided by the Government's policy in fixing the new prices. The increases, averaging about 12*s* 6*d* per ton, represent an increase of just over 1 per cent compared with the 3 per cent sought by many iron and steel companies.

This is the first general increase in maximum steel prices for more than three years and it is claimed that the changes which have taken place in the meantime in the prices of individual products, some up and some down, have had little effect on the overall level of steel prices. The British Iron and Steel Federation in a statement following the price determination, claimed that the Board's pricing policy has been too tough on the producer over recent years. Between 1960 and 1965 steel prices had been allowed to rise only 5 per cent, while coal prices had gone up 12½ per cent and those of all manufactured goods by 14 per cent.

The Federation claimed that the industry's costs had increased by £31 million a year including £9·5 million in respect of coke. The Board disallowed the latter figure but accepted that costs had risen by £21·5 million comprising £11 million increase in charges for electricity, rates, national insurance, road and rail transport and stores, and £10·5 million for wage and salary increases. The rise in prices has been fixed to reflect only the £11 million of cost increases which are outside the industry's control, leaving the industry to absorb the balance.

EMPLOYEES' GIFT VOUCHERS ARE 'INCOME'

IT is established law that where an employee receives money or money's worth in his capacity as an employee, that is not by itself enough to render the money taxable as his emoluments. The money etc. must have been given to him by way of reward for services rendered or to be rendered. The success in the House of Lords of the employee in the case of Hochstrasser v. Mayes (38 A.T.C. 360) has encouraged an attempt to resist claims for tax on the value of gift vouchers made by a company to its employees each Christmas. It will be recalled that in the Mayes case the company had a scheme for indemnifying an employee against the loss on sale of his house when his employer transferred him. The payment in that case was held not to be an emolument, since it was not a reward for work. The House of Lords, however, last week declined to apply the principle to the gift vouchers.

Lord Reid, in Laidler v. Perry, said the question was whether the vouchers (worth £10) were mere personal gifts, inspired not by the hope of some quid pro quo from the donee but simply personal goodwill appropriately signified at Christmas time. That was a question of fact for the Special Commissioners who had said that the vouchers were made available by reason of services, rather than as gifts not constituting rewards for services. The directors had said the gifts were made to foster personal goodwill between management and staff, believing that a contented staff was a good thing in itself and likely to be of advantage to the group of companies. This reason pointed to the object of the gifts as being to obtain results for the company. Whatever the position about gifts made by a person who was not the employer, it was surely right to see why the employer made the gifts. These were regular gifts and they constituted emoluments. Gifts made on special occasions, once and for all, could well be in a different category.

TAXING PAYMENTS UNDER A FOREIGN WILL

THE House of Lords case of Rae v. Lazard Investment Co Ltd (41 A.T.C. 1) showed that in considering the question whether certain payments from overseas were capital or income, one may have to look at the state of the law of the territory from which the payments come. However, in a case decided in the High Court last week (Inchyra v. Jennings) Mr Justice Pennycuick declined to extend that principle to payments which Lady Inchyra received under the will of her mother who died domiciled in the District of Columbia in the United States.

Under the will, Lady Inchyra was entitled to one-quarter of the net income until her father's death, and thereafter to the whole income. She was also entitled to a yearly sum of money for twenty years (or until her earlier death) equal to 1 per cent of the value of the estate, excluding realty. This could be either a sum of money or securities of equivalent value. It was common ground that the nature of Lady Inchyra's interest under the Columbia will was determined by the law of Columbia. However, it was held that for purposes of British income tax it must be determined by reference to British law, and under that law the yearly payments of a percentage of the value were income payments chargeable to tax under Case V of Schedule D.

The Revenue had argued that the two interests constituted separate 'sources' for the purpose of sections 133–134 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, and that the two sources were acquired on separate occasions. The Special Commissioners upheld this argument but Pennycuick, J., allowed Lord Inchyra's appeal on this point and directed that the income be assessed on the footing that all Lady Inchyra's interests under the will and codicil constituted one source. The vagaries of the Case V basis provisions made a material difference.

An Easter Message by a member of The Accountants' Christian Fellowship

IN a sermon on the use of money, John Wesley laid down four tests for what he regarded as its proper use. One of them is particularly strange in the ear of one more accustomed to the normal tests of economic efficiency: 'Can I offer up this action, this expense, as a sacrifice to God through Jesus Christ?'

The man of commerce may well enough dismiss the maxim as a piece of theological jargon. It appears to be tailored for the smug self-righteousness – until we notice those words 'through Jesus Christ', and read it in the light of that many-faceted sacrifice which lies at the heart of Good Friday and Easter.

The Christian Church believes that in Jesus Christ, God entered men's daily life; to share it, to judge it and to redeem both them and it. The Church would be refusing its duty if it did not find that the truth contained in that fact had application to such a fundamental part of human life as not only the gaining, but also the spending, of money.

Perhaps the interpretation is subjective and personal: it is none the less unavoidable for all that. In the way our actions (not our words) shape up to the test there may lie the ultimate test of the sincerity of our faith.

FACTS ON RATES

THE protests from domestic ratepayers over the increased rate charges for the new financial year have been widely publicized, although the more serious increases are highly localized, with some of the London areas coming off worst. The reasons for these increases are not far to seek. Local authority salaries and wages, like others, have gone up; new and expanding services cost more, and finally, current costs of borrowing have risen sharply.

Despite continuing discussion of the need to relieve the ratepayer, this is easier said than done. In an extended summary and review of the Allen Committee's report on the impact of rates on the householder[1], Mr A. R. Ilersic points out that alternative sources of local revenue are difficult to find and that higher Exchequer grants may not shift the burden of local costs very much as between different classes of taxpayer and ratepayer. The author reminds the reader that the Allen Committee found no evidence of hard-

THE audit of the year's accounts had been completed and the two senior auditors visited me with due solemnity for a final discussion of the figures. This discussion is an annual event. We've usually had several ad hoc talks during the course of their attendance; at this stage they'd prepared a first draft of their report, later to be submitted in its final form to our directors. Both sides privately welcomed the opportunity of an informal look at the phraseology of the report, lest some superficially innocuous remark be misinterpreted to somebody's detriment when it falls to be reviewed at board level.

The elder of the two ran through the various analyses with airy facility. He's developed promisingly since he came here first as a cheeky, curly-headed cub notable for his precocious self-assurance. Nowadays he's impressively well-read, tending to produce suddenly a striking quotation from The Financial Times or The Economist or some cogent statistics of international trade, in the middle of a quite casual conversation. He has a vaguely international air which tends to produce inferiority complexes in our less sophisticated junior accountants.

He went down the list of profit and loss account debits with well-briefed commentary, at length pausing momentarily at general insurances. 'Usual routine items', he said perfunctorily, so I decided to test his mettle. 'Surely not routine this year?', I said in astonishment. He paused. His assistant leaped in rashly. 'We have full details in this schedule,' he said. 'It's all spelled out . . . prepaids, accruals, policy numbers, annual debits . . . even the underwriters.'

Young accountants always prepare these textbook schedules. 'What about the fire cover and the contractors' public liability?' I asked, doing a spot of finger-drumming on the desk, and they stiffened sharply. As Macaulay put it:

> 'All shrank, like boys who unaware,
> Ranging the woods to start a hare,
> Come to the mouth of the dark lair
> Where, growling low, a fierce old bear
> Lies amid bones and blood.'

The auditor recovered promptly. 'Cover?' he smiled. 'On the full balance sheet total, naturally; incorporating the revaluation figures written up in 1960 against the increase in capital reserve.' 'That figure is out of date, surely,' I told him. 'The rise in present-day building costs . . . you remember that recent article on replacement values . . . We've arranged another write-up following a further conference with our valuation people.'

The auditor glanced serenely at the brief paragraph sub-headed 'Insurances' in his draft report. 'Yes,' he said, 'I've done a separate report on replacement values; I must have left it in my desk. It explains our concern at last year's underrun and our appreciation of the new cover-provision.' 'You're satisfied with the adequacy of the new figure?' I queried. 'Naturally,' he said, 'when your underwriters and valuers have agreed on it. They're the specialists.'

I said of course we always relied on our auditors to provide an additional independent safeguard by checking the figure, as they'd hardly abdicate responsibility on such a vital point, but he wasn't disconcerted. 'We apply our own modern statistical-scattergraph test to satisfy ourselves,' he said. His blue eyes were blandly innocent; he had shot bear before. 'Far be it from us to imply in our office report that you've underestimated your potential loss; with your years of experience, you're really the expert in this operation. As regards the contractors' P.L., I've done a separate private note to you suggesting that you furnish a report to my principal to forestall any adverse comment on his part . . . it's in my desk.' He retired with the honours of the day.

Not a bad effort for somebody who'd never thought of rising replacement costs until that minute; and who would be hastily telephoning our valuers for their new figure the moment he got back to his desk, in order to write these two addenda.

I wonder whether he'd care to leave practice for commerce; if he would, there's a job waiting for him here; he's the type of accountant we need nowadays!

ship arising from rates among households with an earning head. Such poverty as the committee found was concentrated in the poorer households comprising retired persons living, in many cases, on less than £6 per week. There is a genuine need for relief in the case of such households and this will, of course, mean still higher rates and taxes on those more fortunate.

LIFE ASSURANCE AND THE BUDGET

THE ramifications of the tax system as it applies to life insurance and annuity business are a study in themselves. The precise impact of the new tax proposals is not yet clear, but the Life Offices Association and the Associated Scottish Life Offices have put out a statement which at any rate removes some of the uncertainties. The well-known relief for the payment of life premiums seems to be unaffected. Sums received by a policyholder on maturity or surrender of his policy will not, as such, be chargeable to capital gains tax but these sums may well be less in future since, as it appears, the life offices will have to pay capital gains tax on their own capital gains through switching of the invested funds. Whether the rate charged on them will be the corporation tax rate (which may be as much as 40 per cent), or will be the special overriding income tax standard rate of 7*s* 6*d*, remains to be seen. Pension annuity funds already exempt from income tax will not apparently suffer any capital gains tax.

Finance and Commerce

General Motors

A LONDON Stock Exchange sterling quotation having been obtained for the common shares of the General Motors Corporation, a look at the company's 1964 accounts is of investment as well as accounting interest. The reprint of the accounts can only give a minimum indication of the extent of the operations of this vast organization.

The company's report runs to thirty-six quarto pages of figures, text and pictures, and perhaps the most impressive feature is the date at which the President and Chairman signed their 'Letter to shareholders' and at which the auditors signed their 'Certification of Financial Statements'. This was February 12th – only six weeks after the end of the financial year on December 31st.

What a notable achievement for an organization whose sales in 1964 reached very nearly $17,000 million and whose production activities are carried on in the United States, Canada, Argentina, Australia, Brazil, England and Western Germany.

The statistical information provided in the report breaks down assets and earnings geographically and one table even gives the number of each marque of car, truck and bus made in the United States and totals for cars and trucks in each of the other production areas. The car marques, incidentally, are Buick, Cadillac, Chevrolet, Oldsmobile, and Pontiac.

Consolidation

The consolidated financial statements include all subsidiaries engaged in manufacturing or wholesaling. The balance sheet of the biggest company not consolidated, General Motors Acceptance Corporation – worth $412,677,007 – is shown separately.

The company's practice is to adjust its investments in subsidiaries to reflect current income, losses and dividends. Provisions are made, where applicable, for estimated United States and foreign taxes on dividends which may be paid from undistributed profits. On General Motors' own taxation, the point is made that the company provides for income taxes by charging income with the amounts estimated to be payable. There are differences in any given year between taxable income and the income reported in the accounts but they tend to offset one another over a period of years.

Inventories are stated at the lower of cost or market value with cost being determined substantially on the first in, first out or the average cost basis. On depreciation, notes to the accounts state that use of the 'guideline lives adopted in 1962 brings depreciation more in line with that used for accounting purposes. Accumulated depreciation on the Corporation's books exceeds the accumulated amount deducted for income tax purposes'.

Overwhelming

A point which immediately strikes the reader of the General Motors report is that nowhere does there appear any approximation in the figures – no rounding up to the nearest thousand. Sales, for example, were $16,997,044,468 and the company's 'Worldwide payroll' in 1964 was $4,592,481,478, against an average number of employees of 660,977.

The main 'Statistical summary' covers net sales; net income; net income as a percentage of sales; dividends on the preferred stock; the amount earned on the common stock and the earnings per share; actual dividend on the common stock and payment per share; total dividends as a percentage of net income; net income retained in total and as a percentage per share; expenditure on plant and equipment; payroll and the average number of employees; the number of common and preferred shareholders, and net working capital.

The figures provided under these headings are taken back twenty years. The analysis of car and truck production, already mentioned, is taken back ten years. The wealth of detail, in fact, becomes almost overpowering and tends to make one appreciate the more succinct style followed in the best of British company reports.

Buyer's Last Word

Amid the welter of text, facts and figures it is difficult to find the essence of the General Motors organization. In a section of the report devoted to 'Meeting the General Motors customer's needs' there is, however, evidence of basic policy behind the achievement last year of the production of 4,597,990 vehicles in the United States and another 1,516,488 in the rest of the world.

'In the current automobile market', the report says, 'the buyer has the last word. He knows what he wants. To be successful, a company must cater for his preferences. This is the constant challenge'. General Motors offer 157 models in the United States alone.

Indicating what the customer wants – or what General Motors offers him and persuades him he wants – is the company's list of recent innovations such as tilt and telescope steering, comfort control air conditioning, transistorized AM-FM stereo radio, transistorized ignition system and cornering lights.

These items, and others, are new in the past five years. 'Old hat' are automatic transmission, power brakes, power seats, power steering and power windows. It is possible, the report claims, for General Motors to go through an entire model year without producing two cars which are exactly alike.

CITY NOTES

THERE has rarely been a Budget which has posed so many questions for the City and left so many of them unanswered. Immediately after the Budget share prices were marked down heavily but, subsequently, a smattering of small support and absence of selling brought a powerful rally.

But since then, the trend of the market suggests that the investment mind is so bemused by the problems of corporation tax and capital gains tax, and the implications of both, that the attitude is simply to do nothing until these two taxes can be more clearly analysed.

It could be that smaller investors will simply opt out of the stock-market entirely, simply because of the complications that the Budget has imposed: the reassessment of earnings cover, the worth of overseas income, the effect of corporation tax on investment allowances, and many other points cannot be readily calculated. And institutional investors, all the time they can earn over 8 per cent on short-term money, are hardly likely to take precipitate action in the equity market.

Taxation Cases

Full reports of the cases summarized in this column will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'.

William Cory & Son Ltd v. C.I.R.

In the House of Lords – March 18th, 1965

(Before Lord REID, Lord MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, Lord HODSON, Lord PEARCE and Lord DONOVAN)

Stamp duty – Sale of shares in company – Option to purchase – Shares transferred to option-holder – No beneficial interest passing – Option exercised verbally – Whether transfer deeds dutiable as conveyances on sale – Whether option agreement dutiable – Stamp Act, 1891, sections 1, 54, 59, Schedule I – Law of Property Act, 1925, section 53.

On August 13th, 1957, a representative of the respondent and a representative of a group of companies decided in principle on a sale to the respondent of the shares in the companies at the price of £450,000. On August 20th, 1957, a draft sale agreement was sent to the representative of the companies, and it provided for completion on November 1st, 1957. The draft contained a number of warranties, and in particular a warranty as to title, and it gave the respondent power to rescind if the title was not acceptable.

On September 10th, 1957, the solicitor to the companies sent to the respondent's solicitor a draft in a different form. The price was £450,000 as before, but completion was fixed for immediately after signature. On October 24th, 1957, the solicitor for the companies sent to the respondent's solicitor a clean copy of the draft incorporating the agreed amendments and also further amendments proposed.

On October 25th, 1957, the respondent's solicitor informed the solicitor to the companies by telephone that the respondent required an immediate option on the shares. Three days later the agreement of the vendors to an option was communicated to the respondent's solicitor. The option was conferred by an agreement dated November 1st, 1957. The consideration for the option was £100, and the option was exercisable within thirty days. The consideration for the shares was expressed as £420,856 3s 6d, which, together with the £100, was equivalent to £450,000 after deducting the price of certain shares not comprised in the option agreement. The agreement also provided for the transfer of the shares in the companies to the respondent forthwith, but the transfers were not to pass any beneficial interest in the shares. On the same day eighty-nine transfers of shares in the companies were executed by the vendors and handed to a representative of the respondent. Each transfer was expressed to be in consideration of one shilling, and contained a certificate to the effect that no beneficial interest had passed, and that it was made for the protection of the respondent's option rights, and that the fixed duty of 10s was payable.

On the next day the option agreement and the transfer deeds were submitted to the Controller of Stamps, who contended that the transfer deeds were chargeable as conveyances on sale. The duty amounted to £8,418, and it was paid without prejudice to the contention that no ad valorem duty was payable. On November 8th, 1957, a statutory declaration as to title was given to a representative of the respondent; and on the same day the option was exercised verbally at an interview between a representative of the respondent and the solicitor for the companies. The purchase price was paid forthwith. On May 20th, 1959, the Controller of Stamps adjudicated the option agreement as liable to stamp duty as an agreement for the sale of an equitable interest, and this duty came to £8,420. This assessment of the duty was an alternative to the duty already charged on the transfer deed.

Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal): the transfers were not transfers 'on sale' within section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891; that ad valorem duty was not payable.

In re Embleton's Will Trusts

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
January 14th, 1965
(Before Mr Justice Cross)

Estate duty – Incidence – Bequests free of death duties – Duties payable out of residue – Bequests for life with remainders over – Whether estate duty on deaths of life-tenants payable out of residue – Finance Act, 1894, sections 6, 9.

The testator, who died in 1930, bequeathed 860 shares in a company on trust for the dividends to be paid to eight named persons. He bequeathed another 140 shares on trust to pay the dividends on those shares to seven named persons. The 860 shares were given over to the next of kin of the life-tenants, and the 140 shares were given over to a particular person and after his death to his sons. The remaining shares in the company were, if necessary, to be available for testamentary expenses, pecuniary legacies and death duties; and subject thereto the dividends were to be held on the same trusts as were bequeathed for the residue. The residue was left on trust for sale, and to pay the funeral and testamentary expenses and death duties payable out of capital and to pay any duties or legacies and the death duties on legacies bequeathed free of duty. All those legacies and the duty on those bequeathed free of duty were to be paid primarily out of the personal estate. These dispositions were made free of all death duties, whether payable by the estate or by the beneficiaries, and all the duties were to be paid out of the residue.

The trustees took out a summons to decide whether estate duty payable on the death of a tenant for life of a settled legacy of shares was payable out of the corpus of that legacy or out of the residue.

Held: in this kind of case estate duty was payable out of the corpus of a settled legacy unless the exempting words in the will could not fairly be limited only to the estate duty payable on the testator's death; and that as it was doubtful whether the wording in the present case extended to future estate duty, the duty on the settled legacies, payable on the death of the life-tenants, was payable out of the corpus.

Bowden v. Russell & Russell

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
March 19th, 1965
(Before Mr Justice Pennycuick)

Income tax – Profession – Solicitors – Visiting abroad to attend meeting of American Bar Association and Commonwealth and Empire Law Conference in Ottawa – Whether expenses deductible – Income Tax Act, 1952, sections 122, 123, 126 and 137 (a), (b).

The respondent, a firm of solicitors, appealed against an assessment under Case II of Schedule D for 1961–62, and contended that the amount of the expenses incurred by one of the partners on a visit to the United States and Canada in 1960 was properly deductible in computing the profit from their profession.

During 1960 there was only one partner of the firm, but on January 1st, 1961, another partner entered the firm, and the profits were assessable on the continuance basis. In 1960 the then sole partner visited America and Canada for about six weeks to attend a meeting of the American Bar Association in Washington and to attend the second Commonwealth and Empire Law Conference in Ottawa. The arrangements for the visits to both conferences were made by The Law Society, and a large number of solicitors attended.

The General Commissioners decided that the expenses less £100 were deductible.

Held: none of the expenses were deductible.

Bulkeley-Gavin v. C.I.R.

In the Court of Session – March 25th, 1965
(Before The Lord President (Lord Clyde), Lord Carmont and Lord Guthrie)

Income tax – Maintenance claim – Whether made out of time – Whether General Commissioners had power to extend time – Income Tax Act, 1952, sections 19, 24, 101, 507, Schedule VI, paragraph 1 (1).

On August 12th, 1959, the appellant made a claim, under section 101 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, for maintenance relief for 1952–53. The Inspector of Taxes refused the claim on the ground that it had been made more than six years after the end of the year to which it related. The appellant appealed to the General Commissioners, and contended that they were empowered by paragraph 1 of the Sixth Schedule to the Act to extend the time limit, and he invited them to do so. The General Commissioners decided that they had no power to extend the time.

Held (the Lord President dissenting): there was no power in the General Commissioners to extend the time limit.

Saving in perspective

On any view, freedom from fluctuations is of prime importance to the personal saver. An Abbey National shareholding offers this—and much besides. Shares that hold their price, the certainty of a reasonable return (made even more attractive because Abbey National pay the income tax) and withdrawal facilities that are the nearest thing possible to complete liquidity—these features combine stability, yield and flexibility in a way that meets the needs of many. As an accumulating account for the prudent saver, an income-booster for the small investor, or a stabilising factor in larger portfolios, Abbey National is equally advisable—and equally to be advised. We shall be pleased to give you full information on our facilities for investment.

Career records and long-term objectives will be considered by one of our directors and, in the light of our knowledge and experience, advice will be given as to where the right experience can be gained.

We do not act as a 'Post Office Agency' operated on a haphazard system by subordinate staff. Candidates for positions are introduced to clients only after they have been furnished with the fullest possible details of the client, the type of work which will be undertaken and an explanation as to how this will be of benefit in later life. You are invited to accept our offer of a:

THE HW HARRISON-WILLIS COLUMN

'In spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to love'. A cliché, but, passionate swains, consider the consequences thereof! Swain plus one equals twain equals (probably), three or more after a very short time. Therefore, turn your thoughts, concurrently (if brain space sufficient) to better career prospects and read on remembering always the dreadful equation of life, e.g. one plus one equals two plus one equals three plus one equals four ad inf.

A major British group, whose interests are apparent throughout the U.K., wish to appoint TWO young qualified accountants to a divisional management team which is one of the most alert and progressive in Britain. It is desirable that both will have had at least two years' commercial experience. One will be required to be responsible for the preparation of management statistics, etc., applicable to the division or units thereof; the other to be responsible for running a medium-sized accounts department. In both posts, prospects are considerable for progression within division and group. The divisional offices are in SHEPHERD'S BUSH. The salary range applicable to both posts is £1,500–£1,750 p.a.

HIGHEST EVER GROUP PROFIT BEFORE TAXATION

Continuing trend of Home and Overseas expansion

The Annual General Meeting of Lombard Banking Limited was held on April 23rd at the Dorchester Hotel, London. The following is an extract from the circulated Statement of the Joint Chairmen, Mr Eric J. P. C. L. Knight and Mr Maxwell Joseph.

All Shareholders and Staff will join the Board in wishing Mr Spater, Chairman for many years, every happiness in his retirement. He has been appointed the first President of the Bank.

Mr Maxwell Joseph has become a Director of the Bank.

Mr Eric J. P. C. L. Knight and Mr Maxwell Joseph have been elected Joint Chairmen of the Board.

STATEMENT OF ACCOUNTS

Controlled expansion and development of our business at Home and Overseas is progressing.

Group Results in Brief

The results for the year under review disclose:—

Group Profit before tax	2,083,000	up 62%
Group Profit after tax	933,000	up 31%
Total Assets	129,980,000	up 21%
Current, Deposit and other Accounts	70,043,000	up 15%
Advances to Customers and other Accounts	107,719,000	up 25%
Deferred Charges and Interest	8,668,000	up 36%

Dividend forecast exceeded

Your Board recommends a final dividend of 15% making a total of 20% (17½% last year). This exceeds by 1% the dividend forecast.

This clear trend has produced the highest Group Profit before Taxation ever to be achieved.

Your Board is optimistic for the future as regards both expansion and higher profits but a firm forecast for 1965 would be inappropriate.

CITY OFFICE

During 1964, the Bank's new Offices at 31 Lombard Street in the City of London were opened.

The top floor of Lombard House is now being substantially enlarged. The need for this increased Head Office accommodation demonstrates that Lombard Banking Limited continues to thrive and develop.

HOME SUBSIDIARIES

Lombank enjoyed the most satisfactory year in its history and produced record profits before Taxation. A substantial increase was experienced in amounts advanced to customers embracing the highest standard of quality.

New Branch Offices were opened in Warrington, Huddersfield and Lewisham and will be opened in Hounslow, Chatham, Cambridge, Southend and Sligo in Ireland.

Bank rate at 7% constitutes a material factor in the achievement of profits by any National Finance Company and the new Hire Purchase Act is still untried. The Management have however had experience of similar conditions and remain confident of the continued success and profitability of Lombank.

Devon House Finance Company became wholly-owned during 1964 and will continue as a very profitable Subsidiary.

Awley Finance Company continued its progress as a leading Organization financing Domestic Equipment and Appliances and providing Block Discounting facilities to the Trade.

Tricity Finance concentrating upon finance for Television and Radio, Gas and Electric Cookers, Radiograms and Record Players has a promising future. Closer liaison between Awley Finance and Tricity Finance is being promoted.

Lombard Bank Ireland. The Board of this new Banking Subsidiary has expressed satisfaction with the results achieved to date.

Lombard Holdings, the Investment Subsidiary, showed marked improvement. One investment, which we had held for many years, was disposed of at a most satisfactory profit. Suitable new investments will continue to be acquired.

OVERSEAS SUBSIDIARIES

Our investments Overseas show every promise of producing increasingly satisfactory results.

Lombard Australia reports a satisfactory improvement in management and affairs and an increasing flow of good quality business to our Branches in all States, with consequent improvements to our profits. The profits arising from Lombard Australia in future years should reach a rewarding level.

The potential in Australia is very considerable and our position as one of Australia's leading National Finance Companies has been achieved. We expect to enjoy an increasing share of the prosperity of Australia with attendant improving profits for many years to come.

Lombard New Zealand our oldest Overseas Subsidiary has been consistently profitable to the advantage of the Parent Bank over the years.

The freehold of a large office building in Auckland has been acquired and is now designated Lombard House and our Board have negotiated the purchase of an important office building in Wellington which will become the Head Office of Lombard New Zealand.

Lombank Canada continues to make progress. Conditions for business are highly competitive but 1964 proved to be a more successful year and three new Branch Offices will open during 1965.

Banque Orca achieved a satisfactory year with profits and dividends in accord with expectations.

Banque Orca remains our only investment in Europe but appropriate attention is continually given to the possibilities of developing the the interests of Lombard Banking on the Continent.

CONCLUSION

The Report and Accounts for 1964 reveal results that are the most satisfactory ever recorded by Lombard Banking. No effort will be spared to improve these results during 1965. This will not be easy, for many reasons which will be apparent, but a spirit of confident optimism prevails at all levels at Home and Overseas.

Planning for Practitioners

EVERY accountant in practice stops and asks himself from time to time – How efficiently is my office being run? Am I getting an adequate reward? Would I benefit by merging with another firm? Do the members of my staff know all the answers? These are all leading questions and there are many more which keep recurring. Sometimes the accountant may do something about them there and then; or he may make a note to raise them with his partners at the next convenient opportunity; or, more likely, the telephone rings and in the course of settling problems for a client he forgets all about his own.

Realizing that such matters have a direct bearing on the standards of every professional firm, large and small, the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has planned to issue a series of at least ten booklets, at the rate of one a month, or thereabouts, on different aspects of practice administration. They will vary in length between six thousand and fifteen thousand words but the price will be uniform at 5*s* each. Their authors will be prominent members of the profession, each of them an expert in the appropriate topic under discussion.

The project has got off to a most auspicious start with the appearance this month of the first of the series which is entitled The Development of an Accounting Practice[1]. Its author, Mr E. KENNETH WRIGHT, M.A., F.C.A., stirs the reader at the outset when he states that the foremost factor in developing a practice successfully is 'work of high quality, done on time, and clearly expressed, orally or in writing, in the Queen's English'. For this kind of service there is no substitute and in any community the good practitioner ultimately drives out the indifferent or bad one. Keeping this always in mind, the young practitioner need not be discouraged because he cannot advertise or otherwise seek publicity. As long as he observes the ethical standards of the profession, there is no reason why he should not seek to develop his practice with all the skill and organizing ability at his command.

Mr WRIGHT explains how best this may be done and is emphatic that however deeply immersed the practitioner is with his day-to-day business, he must 'make time' at regular intervals for an introspective survey of his own affairs. His thinking for the future may follow one of two lines: the provision of a detailed plan covering specific objectives, or the creation of an organization which would be able to turn to advantage any opportunities which might arise – what Mr WRIGHT aptly calls 'an environment for growth'.

[1] Obtainable from the offices of the Institute, 56-66 Goswell Road, London EC1. Price 5*s*.

Both methods have to provide the answers to three questions – What services do my clients really need? Can I supply these services? How can I improve my relationship with clients and others?

The easiest to deal with is, of course, the first. Mr WRIGHT does not list the required services in detail but refers his readers to the Institute's successful booklet, See a Chartered Accountant, and to the paper on 'The future role of the accountant in practice' given by Sir HENRY BENSON, C.B.E., F.C.A., at the 1958 autumn meeting of the Institute and reproduced in these columns on October 11th and 18th of that year. He also gives a check list in an appendix and makes some salutary comments on audits and taxation, management services and the giving of personal financial advice. In particular, he deprecates the inferiority complex which many practitioners have about the so-called mystique of management services and refers them to the paper by Mr A. B. SNOW, F.C.A., called 'Service to the private company and its members' presented at the Institute's Oxford summer course in 1961.

While it is true that advising a client in management problems may call for a different attitude of mind from that required for auditing, the ability to do so is becoming more and more important. This derives from the fact that the more mechanical accounting routines become, the more the client regards an audit as an unnecessary expense imposed upon him by statute. The auditor who, with his built-in knowledge of the client's system, can help to improve its efficiency will earn not only gratitude but additional and ungrudged fees.

In considering how to plan for the provision of the services likely to be needed, Mr WRIGHT is insistent that, despite protests of busyness, there are few practitioners whose time is wholly occupied by work which cannot be delegated. Good organization can, therefore, free a sufficiency of hours in which to sit back and, as Lord HALDANE once said, think imperially. The art of delegation (not to be confused with the manoeuvre known as 'passing the buck') must be mastered and junior partners, managers and secretaries made to feel that they are essential members of a team to whom responsibility may be entrusted. This outlook, once cultivated, lends itself to the acceptance of the idea of specialization and partners and staff should, or indeed must, be identified with departments, and analyses of costs and fees kept so that progress, comparative and absolute, may be ascertained.

The three essentials for improving relations with clients are, in Mr WRIGHT's opinion, good work, good service and good presentation. He deplores the general decline in good service without which client cultivation cannot prosper. To the practitioner, giving satisfactory service to a client should largely be a matter of common sense. His explanations should be straightforward and presented in a way which may be easily understood. He should be readily available to clients and in order to be able to do so should have a flexible organization and deploy to the best advantage help from junior partners, senior staff, secretaries and the telephone. Letters should be answered promptly. He should be properly briefed for meetings, not only in the subject-matter to be discussed but in such details as he is expected to know about his client's health and personal affairs. Any suggestions he can make regarding the welfare or improvement of his client's business is an almost certain way of promoting goodwill.

Presentation covers every facet of an accountant's office including the tidiness of the waiting room, the choice of stationery and printing and typewriting media, the adoption of attractive design and layout for accounts and the personal appearance of everyone from a senior partner down to the most junior articled clerk. Although a separate booklet devoted to staff matters will follow, much of the material in this one is applicable to all grades and should, therefore, be read by partners and clerks alike. The impression which these and other members of the firm make when they come into direct contact with, say, lawyers, bankers and brokers is also stressed. New business from these sources may often be attracted by a pleasing and crisply professional manner.

Mr WRIGHT ends what must be one of the most penetrating commentaries of the practising side of the profession ever written with the warning that development is expensive. If, however, the other booklets in the series are of a comparable standard, then the purchase of as many copies of the complete series as are necessary for circulation among partners and staff should prove to be an investment remunerative out of all proportion to the outlay involved.

The Influence of the Institute

DESPITE an increase in revenue from members' subscriptions from £253,807 to £362,855, the surplus for the year 1964 transferred to the Accumulated Fund in the balance sheet of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales was only £14,269 as compared with £1,347 for 1963. Special items of expense were the removal to and the fitting out of the temporary offices in Goswell Road which came to £40,019 (in addition to the £11,000 debited in 1963) and the bulk of the cost of the production of the Practitioner Enquiry report (£13,354), the 1963 figure being £3,093. Revenue from subscriptions reflected the higher rates operative from January 1st, 1964, but, with heavy capital commitments pending for the reconstruction of Moorgate Place, the Council feels obliged to ask members to authorize further increases at a special meeting fixed for September 23rd.

Numerically, the membership continues to grow, the record total at January 1st, 1964, of 37,880 being augmented by a further 1,413 to give 39,293 at the end of the year. The intake of articled clerks continues to be satisfactory, the number of articles of clerkship registered during 1964 being 3,511 as compared with 3,549 in 1963. The Council continues to maintain close contact with schools career masters, youth employment offices and university authorities in order to keep recruitment up to the desired strength.

Indicative of the development of the Institute's own plans for post-qualification study is the change of name of the Summer Course Committee to the Courses Committee. The electronic data processing courses continue to grow in popularity; three series have been held so far and another takes place at Brighton next month. The business sessions after the 1963 and 1964 annual meetings were so successful that they will be repeated again this year. Members have been asked to notify the Secretary of the Institute of any preferences they may have in the subject-matter, timing and location of further courses. Another welcome sign of 'graduate' activity is the increase in membership of the district societies. Grants by the Institute in 1964 totalled £36,112 as against £15,428 in 1963.

A new recommendation on accounting principles – on 'Hire-purchase, Credit Sale and Rental Transactions' – appeared during the last twelve months as, also, did two further statements on auditing, one dealing with 'Internal Control' and the other with 'Auditors' Reports on Group Accounts'. In this issue we welcome, in another leading article, the first of what promises to be an outstanding series of booklets on matters of concern to all practitioners. Some idea of the range of influence exerted by the Institute may be obtained from the fact that during the year it was consulted by and, where required, proferred advice to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the President of the Board of Trade, the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies, the Council of The Stock Exchange, the British Standards Institution, the British Medical Association, the British Productivity Council and the Association of British Travel Agents.

As always, the Institute has maintained friendly relations with other professional bodies at home and abroad, notably with the Scottish and Irish Institutes through the Chartered Accountants Joint Standing Committee, and with continental bodies through the Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers. It was represented during the year at official functions in Austria, France and the Netherlands and also at the conference called a year ago by the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations to discuss questions of interest between professional bodies in Great Britain and those in Commonwealth countries.

The accounts of the Institute have been redrafted so as to show in a separate schedule an analysis of the net revenue expenditure in 1964 with establishment and administration expenses allocated (on statistical bases) over the main functions. It reflects great credit on the Council and the Institute secretariat that, despite the dislocation and inconvenience caused by the reconstruction of their headquarters, these functions continue to be added to each year and in a precisely efficient manner which only abundant reserves of energy and enthusiasm could encompass.

Group Rate Costing of Labour

by MARTIN E. SIMONS, B.Sc.(Econ.), M.S., F.C.A.

THE Agricultural Division of Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd has about seven and a half thousand weekly-paid employees on its Billingham site in County Durham. The main products of the division are fertilizers, industrial chemicals and building products.

The complexity of the manufacturing processes and size of the payroll make the task of costing labour to cost centres a substantial one. To eliminate the work of costing each employee's wages to individual cost centres and to provide simple but adequate management control information, a group rate system of costing of labour was introduced some time ago, and while some changes have recently been made to simplify procedures, the success of the system prompts this article which may be of interest to other members of the profession.

There are many methods of collecting labour costs, and this particular system may be varied to suit individual needs – even for introduction into quite small factories.

The group rate system of costing labour provides for men engaged on similar work to be grouped together for cost allocation purposes, and for all the time worked to be charged at a predetermined average rate for the group.

Advantages

The several advantages of using group labour rates include the following:

(1) Managers have to remember only the average hourly rate of a group to estimate the cost of a job. This is particularly relevant for maintenance work carried out by a gang or a process carried on by a team.

(2) Known labour cost rates facilitate budgeting and, when group rate costs are compared with budgets, any differences will normally indicate usage rather than price variances. Plant management is primarily interested in usage variances as it does not control labour rates.

(3) A weekly time-sheet is used for each predetermined group of payroll employees. This weekly group time-sheet eliminates an individual daily or weekly time-sheet for each employee, thereby saving work by factory clerks or assistant foremen.

(4) For wages purposes, a daily exceptions sheet for each group of men is submitted from the plant to time clerks when employees have been absent, worked overtime, or have worked on a job at a different rate from their standard rate of pay. There is a significant work saving for the labour department time clerks who only verify non-standard clocking on clock cards.

(5) By eliminating the daily or weekly time-sheet for each employee, and introducing a fixed hourly cost rate for the men of a particular group, wages clerks of the accountancy department need not enter the gross wage of each employee on to his summary time-sheet. The subsequent manual or mechanical pro-rating of an employee's wage to each cost centre and the big task of collecting together the costs of every employee's time spent on each cost centre are also greatly simplified.

(6) Only one type of group time-sheet is used and this eliminates the use of a multiplicity of forms and simplifies printing and stock holding.

(7) By divorcing the price of each individual employee's worked hours from the gross wages paid to him that week (bonus one week in arrears), the bottle-neck whereby costing cannot be started until wages are calculated is eliminated. Thus the group rate system of costing labour speeds up costs for management.

(8) Overtime hours worked by each gang or group of men can readily be abstracted from the weekly group time-sheets. The system speeds up the flow of information to managers. The time each group spends on each cost centre is summarized and the cost can be evaluated manually or on a computer, or with less elaborate equipment.

One term which is used on the weekly costing summary is 'given time'. Given time is the premium element paid when overtime is worked. For example, if four hours are worked at time and a half, four hours are charged to attendance time and two hours to given time. Both attendance time and given time are evaluated at the same hourly rate.

Detailed Operation

Formation of Gangs or Groups of Men and Calculation of Rates

Engineers and plant managers are asked to group their employees; a group may consist of (a) men who are on a similar rate of pay, or (b) men on different rates of pay who work as a group. For simplicity of operation the number of groups should be kept to the minimum.

Works accountants calculate the average wage for each member of each group, taking into account regular bonuses, and an average hourly rate is calculated for the group. The rate can be increased by dependent labour charges which consist of such expenses as company contributions for pensions, National Insurance, etc. Rates are examined periodically to eliminate the possibility of excessive over- or under-recovery of costs. However, if there is a change in wage rates, then the group rates must be adjusted accordingly.

Introduction of System on Plant

Supervisors and their clerks who complete daily or weekly individual payroll employee time-sheets must learn which group(s) their men belong to, and complete the weekly group time-sheets. Detailed instructions are printed on the back of the weekly group time-sheet (Form 1 as illustrated) as follows:

(1) The weekly costing summary sheet Form 1 is applicable to all groups of labour in the factory.

(2) The detailed portion of the summary sheet is divided into seven sections each of three lines and should be used for shift work in the existing manner, each line representing the appropriate morning, afternoon and night shift for the day.

For day work the significance of the divisions may be ignored if desired, thus allowing twenty-one lines of entry for each week, for each job number.

'Given time' is represented by seven lines, one for each day. Once again these should be adhered to for shift work but may be ignored for day work.

(3) Hours will continue to be entered into the detailed columns to the nearest ¼ hour, but when these columns are totalled for the week for both attendance time and 'given time', the following procedure will apply:

(i) Quarter hours in the total will be ignored, e.g. 16¼ shown as 16.

(ii) Three-quarters of an hour in the total will be shown as the next whole number, e.g. 16¾ as 17.

(iii) Half an hour in the total in an attendance hour column marked ⧗ and in 'given time' column marked ⧗ is ignored, e.g. 16½ entered as 16. When the half occurs in an unmarked column the total will be shown as the next whole number, e.g. 16½ as 17.

(4) A cross summation of the whole hour totals to job numbers will be made and entered in the panel marked summary total.

(5) If the reconciliation is more than 1 per cent ± in error a check should be made of the basic entries and the arithmetic leading to the totals.

A variance of the above degree is expected with the rounding off procedure and therefore no attempt should be made to make the figures agree by arbitrary adjustment.

(6) A weekly reconciliation is unlikely to be possible on groups of shift labour; but foremen and their assistants should check as at present, that the total hours against job numbers for the shift equals the attendance time of the shift.

Organization and methods staff normally attend to the briefing of factory clerks when the new system is introduced.

Labour Department – Time Clerks

As time clerks will no longer receive an individual daily or weekly time-sheet for each payroll employee, they must be informed of the normal wages category or grading of each employee. The standard information is address plated weekly on to each clock card. The only information which the time clerk then requires is daily authorized notification from the plant of:

(a) absences,
(b) overtime and lateness,
(c) temporary wage rate changes.

Where there has been no change a nil return is required from plant personnel.

Accountancy

The gross wages actually paid are debited weekly to a control account. The wages costed out by predetermined group rates are credited weekly to this account. The difference represents over- or under-recovered costs and will be charged to profit and loss, overheads, or works miscellaneous charges. Group rates are examined periodically to eliminate the possibility of excessive under- or over-recoveries.

Basis Periods under Schedule D for Individuals

by H. S. A. MACNAIR, F.C.A.

DESPITE the close relationship between assessments and income which the corporation tax is designed to produce, it appears that as far as individuals are concerned the existing problems must continue to be faced so that it will in some cases be only by accident that the total assessed over the period of duration of a source will exactly equal the income arising from it.

Case VIII is charged by reference to the rents or receipts to which a person becomes entitled in the year of assessment (section 15 (3), Finance Act, 1963). Case VII is concerned with gains from the acquisition and disposal of all forms of property with the exception of tangible movable property and certain gains arising from a business, employment or private dwelling and section 13 (2) of the Finance Act, 1962, provides for the computation of the gain in one amount in relation to each disposal, the date of which is to fix the date of the gain except where it precedes the acquisition, in which event the date of acquisition determines the year of assessment.

Addition to a Source

Case III relates to interest and income of the like character and in the case of a continuing source, the assessment for a given fiscal year is based on the income arising in the previous fiscal year. Similar remarks apply to income from securities out of the United Kingdom (Case IV), or from possessions out of the United Kingdom (Case V), subject to the modifications applicable to 'remittance men' noted below.

The reference to a source is to be interpreted as if each addition to a source was itself a separate source (sections 131 (3) and 134 (3), Income Tax Act, 1952). For this purpose an addition may be represented by discrete elements of principal of a homogeneous character, such as successive lodgements in a bank deposit account governed by a continuing contract (Hart v. Sangster (36 A.T.C. 63; 37 T.C. 231)).

On the other hand, the quirks and quibbles of income tax law as applied to the taxable status of an individual are not permitted to obscure the identity of a continuing source viewed in relation to its owner. Hence there was held to be one continuing source in the case of a widow although previous assessments had been made in her late husband's name (Leitch v. Emmott (8 A.T.C. 190; 14 T.C. 633)).

Again, the acquisition of residence status by an arrival in the United Kingdom gave rise to an initial assessment on the footing that there had been a continuing source both in the case where the basis was the income arising abroad (Back v. Whitlock (11 A.T.C. 74; 16 T.C. 723)) and where the basis was the income remitted (Carter v. Sharon (15 A.T.C. 122; 20 T.C. 229)). The latter basis is applicable in the case of a 'remittance man', an expression used in this article to denote an individual who is either (a) not domiciled in the United Kingdom; or (b) one who, being a British subject or a citizen of the Republic of Ireland, is not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom; or (c) a pensioner, in so far as concerns his overseas pension entitlement; or (d) one who, either alone or in partnership, is carrying on abroad any trade, profession or vocation, so far as concerns any income which is immediately derived by him therefrom.

A special case arises in relation to overseas income (other than from the Republic of Ireland) payable under deduction of income tax through a Paying Agent. If, however, any instalment is paid gross it represents the arising of a new source of income.

Cessation

The rules for cessation applicable to Cases III, IV and V of Schedule D are now to be found in section 18 of the Finance Act, 1952, they are designed to operate when an individual ceases to possess the whole or a part of any particular source of income, and apply in relation to the part undergoing change. The 'actual' basis of assessment is prescribed for the year in which possession of the source ceases while the greater of the amount of the income for the penultimate or ante-penultimate years is prescribed as the measure of the assessment for the penultimate year. Where, however, there is a gap of one or more complete fiscal years between the year of assessment in which income last arose and the year in which possession of the source terminated, then there is an option available to the taxpayer whereby the effective date of termination can be related back to the year in which income last arose.

The usual six-year time limit operates and this necessarily expires eight years after the end of the year of assessment in which income last arose. The scheme is rounded off by a rule which permits the passing of six consecutive years without any income having arisen to be treated, optionally, as the termination of the source, with a concomitant right of election (to be exercised within two years) to have the terminal date related back as described above. Should income subsequently arise without any break in continuity of actual ownership, the later income is to be treated as having arisen from a source newly acquired.

Where the preceding-year basis of assessment is in operation it could happen that an assessment falls to be made for a year in which no actual income arose. The validity of the assessment in such a case is confirmed by section 149 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. It could also happen that no interest arises in a particular year due to a waiver of the right to receive it, but such a waiver does not create a discontinuity in the source if the principal remains in being and resumption of interest payments in the future is not precluded (Cull v. Cowcher (13 A.T.C. 73; 18 T.C. 449)).

Actual Basis

Where a new source of income is acquired the assessments under Cases I, II, III, IV and V for the first year are made on the actual income arising (or remitted) in that year. Under Cases III, IV and V the actual basis also applies in the second year unless in the first year the income first arose on April 6th, in which event the preceding-year basis operates with effect from the second year, subject to the taxpayer's right to elect for the actual basis for that second year. Where the income did not first arise on April 6th, the preceding-year basis of assessment begins to operate from the third year, again subject to the taxpayer's right to elect once for an actual basis.

These rules differ from those applicable to Cases I and II where April 6th has no significance, the individual taxpayer having a right of election for the actual basis exercisable in respect of both the second and third year but not one or the other alone. Where no such election is made, then only the third year of assessment is dealt with on the preceding-year basis, the amount assessable for the second year being reckoned by reference to the actual results of the first twelve months from commencement of trading.

Where accounts of a trade are made up for irregular periods and, in particular, where the accounting period straddles a complete fiscal year there are special rules which require a decision as to the appropriate basis periods and consequential liabilities to be referred to the discretion of the Inland Revenue or the Commissioners appointed to hear appeals.

Moreover the rules applicable under Cases I and II to a cessation of a trade, profession or vocation occurring after April 5th, 1964, are regulated by section 46 of the Finance Act, 1963, which extends the Revenue's right to raise assessments for the penultimate year on an actual basis so as to include the ante-penultimate year.

'Remittance' and 'Arising' Bases

Mention has been made above of the distinctive treatment accorded to 'remittance men' but in certain circumstances this class of taxpayer may claim the application of methods of assessment which are a compendium of the 'remittance' and 'arising' bases. Section 12 of the Finance Act, 1956, is concerned with the situation where, by reason of the laws of the territory where the income arose or of executive action of its Government or the impossibility of obtaining foreign currency in that territory, the owner of the source is unable to transfer income to the United Kingdom promptly despite reasonable endeavours on his part. The section is designed to mitigate the effect of a concentration of income in a single year and the amounts in question are to be dealt with as if they had been remitted in whatever period would cause them to be assessed in the year of assessment in which they actually arose.

A claim extends only to the amounts of income prejudicially affected, due apportionment being made, and double assessment is excluded. Comparable rules applicable to profits or income unremittable are to be found in section 21 of the Finance Act, 1953, while section 497 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, permits a waiver of the charge for interest otherwise imposed by section 495 in respect of tax of not less than £1,000 charged by any Schedule D assessment which is not settled within three months of the due date.

Republic of Ireland

In the case of an individual resident in the United Kingdom, having property situate in the Republic of Ireland or profits or gains arising there, but not being himself resident there, it is provided that a United Kingdom tax liability is imposed in respect of the gross income, the Irish tax being recoverable by claim. Paragraph 2 (1) of Part II of the Eighteenth Schedule to the Income Tax Act, 1952, substitutes the arising for the remittance basis (if applicable) and prescribes that assessments under Cases IV or V are to be made throughout on the current year as basis period, subject to the use of an average period where appropriate. This procedure echoes to some extent the rules for Case VI which charges many specific categories of income, often of a 'deemed' nature, as well as annual profits or gains not falling under any other case or schedule. These rules involve reference to the actual income of the year of assessment or, as an alternative at the discretion of the Commissioners, an average period not exceeding one year (section 135).

Under Case III the current-year basis is also laid down in relation to small maintenance payments, the amount assessable being limited to the amounts due in any year so far as actually paid either in that or a subsequent year. The payments here in question are those made to or for the benefit of the other party of a marriage at a rate not exceeding £7 10s weekly (since 1960), or for the maintenance or education of a minor at a rate not exceeding £2 10s weekly.

Interest under £15

On the other hand, the preceding-year basis has been retained in connection with section 9 of the Finance Act, 1956, which introduced an 'abatement' of interest under £15 per annum arising on certain deposit accounts, e.g. with the Post Office Savings Bank, but the abatement is defined in terms which eliminate the relevant proportion of the income arising from that source for income tax purposes without abrogating the normal rules for assessment. The 'abatement' is to be grossed up at the standard rate of income tax for surtax purposes so that both the income arising for the basis period and any abatement applicable thereto require to be included in the relevant assessment which in accordance with section 131 (3) includes all income liable to be dealt with under Case III.

THE ACCOUNTANT

ANNUAL AWARDS for 1965

The two companies which have been selected to receive The Accountant Annual Awards for 1965 are:

THOMAS TILLING LTD

and

WOLSELEY-HUGHES LTD

The reports and accounts of these companies were judged the best of almost 1,250 entries for this year's Awards.

Each year's Awards are for reports and accounts presented at company annual meetings held during the previous calendar year. The Award to Thomas Tilling, therefore (which is that for large companies), is in respect of their accounts for the year to December 31st, 1963, presented at the company's annual general meeting on May 13th, 1964.

Wolseley-Hughes receive the Award for 'smaller' companies requiring less complex accounts than those of a large group, in respect of their accounts for the year to July 31st, 1964, presented at the company's annual general meeting on December 9th, 1964.

The Lord Mayor of London, Alderman Sir James Miller, LL.D., will present the Awards at the Mansion House on May 18th, in the presence of a distinguished company representing the City, the professions, commerce and industry.

The Awards, which are of equal rank, each take the form of a pair of hand-made silver wall sconces inscribed with the name of the winning company and specially designed with ancient and modern symbolism depicting commerce and accountancy. They are made annually to companies whose shares are quoted on a recognized stock exchange in the United Kingdom, in relation to the form and content of their published reports and accounts; particular importance is attached to the adequacy of the information given and its presentation.

Panel of Judges

The members of the Panel of Judges are Mr Roy Borneman, Q.C., Chairman; Mr R. Adams, C.A., The Hon. J. F. H. Baring, Mr W. G. Campbell, B.A., F.C.A., Mr A. S. H. Dicker, M.B.E., F.C.A., Mr J. A. 'Certainty' or Realism in Accounting - II

by A. S. CARRINGTON
Professor of Accountancy, University of Canterbury

A Possible Solution

MOST suggestions which are advanced for the improvement of accounting envisage a single, new, revised structure. The discussion in the preceding section leads, however, to the thought that a more suitable solution would result from the development of a range of accepted accounting models, each carefully defined and labelled. The basis for differentiating among a theoretically infinite variety of models, and the procedure by which some would come to be 'accepted', requires some discussion.

The most fundamental distinction between different models is the nature of the test used to recognize a transaction, and thus to determine what effects will be incorporated in the resulting accounting statements. At one extreme lies the purely 'cash-basis' accounting model which recognizes only actual, past cash flows as transactions. This model undoubtedly embodies a maximum degree of 'objectivity'.[1] It may well be asked whether such a model is legitimate, since matching of costs and revenue would occur only where the corresponding cash flows took place in the same period. In this paper it is not intended to reopen the 'cash versus accrual' controversy, but it is maintained that for special applications, such as governmental and non-trading organization use, this model is permissible. Indeed the 'cash-flow' controversy over the past few years suggests that for a variety of investment and financial decisions, true cash-basis statements,[2] might serve a useful purpose for companies – not as replacements for other accounting figures, but as an alternative and equally valid view of the effect of operations for the period, when liquidity or management of cash resources is a major concern of the user of the accounts.

A more conventional model, still retaining a high degree of objectivity, would be a historical-cost, accrual-accounting model with cost-based adjustment for depreciation. This model would recognize completed or realized transactions of a non-cash nature as well as cash flows. Apart from specifically nominated rates of depreciation, amortization and depletion based on historical cost, all 'non-objective' adjustments would be excluded – even reduction of inventory values below cost on a falling market and provisions generally. This model would have merit whenever complete objectivity was the main characteristic sought. It might be suggested that even more extreme objectivity could be attained by omission of provision for depreciation at all – thus not recognizing reduction in fixed asset values until disposal. Ridiculous though this model may seem to accountants, many financial analysts have expressed dissatisfaction with accounting profit as a basis for comparing the results of different companies, and some have complained specifically that arbitrary provisions for depreciation or depletion are a major cause of distortion. Perry Mason[3] quotes such views as:

> 'In evaluating . . . common stocks, the cash flow has come to be regarded as frequently more meaningful than net income alone as a measurement of a company's ability to finance its expansion without undue borrowing or extraordinary withholding of dividends from shareholders.'
> 'And lastly – and possibly most important – is the fact that much of the profit margin squeeze is artificial, because one of the most rapidly increasing cost items is depreciation charged off against the newly created facilities.'
> '. . . The use of cash earnings figures helps to iron out differences in accounting procedures among oil and gas companies.'

As accountants, it is easy to deplore the misunderstanding of the present, generally accepted, accounting model implicit in much of this criticism. Nevertheless there is clear evidence of a demand for information at present unfilled by current accounting statements. This suggests that even a purely historical accrual-accounting model might, for certain uses, have some value.

These two extreme models have been introduced into the discussion not as desirable innovations, but only to emphasize that if they can meet a need, and if misuse is guarded against by clear definition of the basis on which they have been prepared, they are as

[1] 'Objectivity' is used in the sense of employing data verifiable by evidence other than the personal opinion or subjective judgement of some individual or group of persons. Thus accounting measurements based on past external transactions can normally be considered objective, whereas in most cases current valuations of assets still retained are necessarily based on an act of judgement.

[2] Cash basis statements of operating results would be summaries of all cash receipts and payments of a revenue nature, not 'cash-flow' in the sense often used in financial circles, i.e. net profit plus depreciation etc. provided, about which W. A. Paton said: '. . . the sum of net earnings and the depreciation deduction may often be hopelessly in error as a measure of cash "currently generated" from operations'. ("The "Cash-flow" illusion.' Accounting Review, April 1963.)

legitimate a record as are more conventional models in relation to the ends which the latter serve.

With some modifications to the pure historical accrual-accounting model a suitable 'tax-accounting' model could be produced. This would embody the use of scale rates of depreciation, including all special and incentive allowances. It would also follow tax rules in distinguishing between capital and revenue expenditure.[1] Presumably the rules for stock valuation would be designed to give objective, easily verified results which might differ widely from the more realistic, subjective valuations used in models intended as the basis for managerial or investment decisions.

This discussion of possible models has followed the historical order of development of accounting by commencing with the cash-basis and the highly objective historical models. Almost certainly, however, most room for useful development would be found among the more subjective models. The most conventional of these would be an accrual accounting model, employing historical cost data, but embodying managerial judgement– unfettered by considerations of taxation – in such matters as depreciation, inventory valuation and provision on debtors' accounts or for liabilities.

An obvious addition to the range of possible models would be one incorporating index number adjustments for general price level changes. Such a model could throw light on the extent to which computed profits have resulted from active operations or have been generated purely by changes in the value of the money unit reflected in rising price levels. For many aspects of business financing, including the effect of using debt or equity funds in different proportions, such a model could provide significant information. Even more important is the ability to assess whether the real capital of the business, rather than just the money capital, is being kept intact. This has obvious implications for distribution policies.

A more radical change from conventional accounting would result from the use of models which incorporated changes in the value of specific assets, whether realized or not. As all assets would be stated at current market values, the balance sheet provided by this model would show a much closer approximation to the current worth of the business than would normally be the case in a balance sheet based on historical costs. The aggregate profit for each period could also be analysed to show the operating profit based on matching current sales against the current cost of the necessary inputs to achieve them. This would be separate from the gain or loss arising from changes during the period in the value of specific assets held. This concept of operating profit should be a much more relevant indicator of economic deficiency than accounting profit as currently computed.

The models outlined by no means exhaust the possible range of choice. Many variants can be envisaged. It is not difficult to find grounds for criticizing individual models – particularly those employing current appraisal values – as being unsuitable for universal application because they lack objectivity. Nevertheless, to reject a model which can yield useful information for even one purpose is to deprive users of some of the potential value of accounting. A more flexible attitude would open the way for new models yielding data of greater relevance for many decisions – which must be oriented towards the future – while retaining the virtues of more objective models for the uses to which they are appropriate.

The range of purposes which accounting information serves has grown wider over the centuries and the rate of growth has become more rapid during the past few decades. There is every reason to believe that similar expansion will continue, provided that accounting can meet with reasonable adequacy the new demands made upon it in the future. To indicate the diversity of purpose which already exists, two lists, neither claiming to be exhaustive, may be quoted.

> '. . . let me restate briefly some of the situations in which statements of the net income of business enterprises have significant influence on important decisions:
> (1) In decisions whether to buy or sell securities.
> (2) In corporate dividend policy.
> (3) In decisions to reinvest earnings in expansion of productive facilities.
> (4) In the levying of income taxes.
> (5) In fixing the rates (prices) of regulated industries.
> (6) In price determinations of unregulated business.
> (7) In granting long-term credit.
> (8) In collective bargaining.
> (9) In calculating national income and gross national product.
> (10) In fixing various kinds of property rights between parties.'[2]

'Accounting is an essential tool in the effective management of business enterprises, with particular usefulness in such activities as the following:

(1) Outlining the basic objectives of the enterprise.
(2) Developing a plan of operation and projecting its results.
(3) Creating an organization suitable for the programme undertaken.
(4) Providing controls over the activities conducted.
(5) Determining costs of products and activities.
(6) Establishing prices for the goods and services offered.
(7) Evaluating results of operations and performance of personnel.

It is hardly to be wondered at that difficulties of relevance and consistency arise in attempting to serve this variety of special needs within the confines of a single model.

The important issue is not merely the devising of different models or the preparation of accounts on varying bases. Almost certainly examples of the use of most of the models referred to could be found in existing practice, while already some businesses may use two or more simultaneously. The significant break with current practice which is advocated is twofold:

(a) The recognition that each model yields a separate and independent accounting result, each being as legitimate in the use to which it is appropriate as are other models for the particular purposes which they are designed to serve; and

(b) The clear labelling or differentiation of each model, by providing a full statement of the assumptions on which it has been based, as an integral part of the presentation.

In brief, it is submitted that accounting should be recognized as embodying statistical techniques capable of producing different sorts of information about the same basic events to meet varying purposes, rather than being confined to a single, authoritative, general-purpose set of statements of spurious validity for many uses. The product of the accounting process should be diversified, carefully differentiated and accurately labelled.

5. Objections to Diversification of Accounting Models

It is not difficult to foresee some of the objections which such a radical change in accounting would provoke. Undoubtedly they would include some of the following criticisms:

(a) That public confidence would be undermined by the appearance of several sets of 'accounts' for the same undertaking, leading to confusion as to the 'true' results.

(b) That tax evasion and deception of the public would be facilitated by the increased flexibility allowed and by loss of 'objectivity'.

(c) That auditors would be placed in the 'impossible' position of approving more than one accounting result for the same period.

(d) That accountants would have difficulty in deciding which model to employ.

There is no doubt that the 'public' has long been conditioned to accept the idea of a single, more or less infallible accounting result. However, among users of accounts – including bankers, active investors, tax authorities and business executives – there has grown up a good deal of scepticism regarding conventional accounts. These people already customarily adjust or modify the regular accounts to yield information suitable for their particular purpose – so far as the available data will permit. Opinions on 'cash-flow' type adjustments have been quoted in the previous section. In New Zealand it has been recognized in recent legislation[1] that balance sheet values for land and buildings should be supplemented by Government valuations when a take-over is in prospect. Few substantial lenders would be prepared to accept the figures for debtors, inventories or intangibles without further inquiry. Once these relatively active users of accounting data were given precise information as to the basis on which each set of accounts was prepared, and more particularly when they appreciated that a model relevant to their purposes could be produced, there is little likelihood of confusion being more than a temporary aspect of transition. The average layman might well be uncertain about the significance of diversified accounts – but already he is in doubt about the meaning of those now available to him. Nevertheless, clear disclosure of the assumptions employed would improve the position of the layman. He should in any case seek expert guidance, and knowledge of these assumptions should facilitate the task of interpretation undertaken on his behalf. It is unrealistic to assume, either under existing conditions or in the event of diversification becoming accepted, that the significance of accounting statements can be made immediately self-evident to unskilled observers. On this point the American Accounting Association says:

> 'The use by investors of published financial statements in making investment decisions and in exercising control over management should be considered of primary importance. It seems reasonable to assume that those using financial statements for these purposes will be willing and competent to read them carefully and with discrimination.'[2]

Determination of tax liabilities calls for a more rigid model than that represented by present, accepted, accounting methods. It is this fact which leads to friction on such matters as inventory valuation and 'approved' rates of depreciation. A recent survey of the future of the accountancy profession, prepared by the American Institute of C.P.A.s,[3] commented on this issue as follows:

> 'It will be obvious that standards appropriate for measuring and communicating economic data to satisfy the needs of the long-term stockholder are not all necessarily the most appropriate to meet the needs of the income-taxing authority, the regulatory or supervisory body, or other data users already mentioned,'

> 'The accounting rules laid down by Congress and the courts for income tax purposes, often differ widely from – indeed, sometimes they are directly contrary to –those applicable to income statements for other purposes. In some areas, therefore, there is a wide range for difference of opinion as to the permissible treatment of an item of income or expense, which may have a significant bearing on the amount of tax payable for a given period.'

There can be few accountants who have never seen good accounting practice subordinated to tax considerations. Adoption of a tax-accounting model explicitly separate from those used for reporting to other parties could eliminate this influence. Furthermore, since the need for an uneasy compromise between certainty for tax purposes and realism for use in other decisions would be removed, the tax model could be more precisely determined than at present. Not only depreciation rates but also criteria for recognition of income and expense and the basis of inventory valuation could be made more rigid.[1] The tendency would be rather for less scope to manipulate accounts for tax purposes than the reverse. Clearly this would be in the public interest.

With the use of distinct models prepared on a known basis, the risk of the investing public being misled by the presentation of accounts whose meaning is obscure or distorted would also be reduced. The American Accounting Association has said:

> 'Because the effective use of financial statements involves inter-period and inter-company comparisons, comparability of data over time and among companies is important. The principal barriers to such comparability are distortions resulting from price fluctuations and variations in accounting methods.'[2]

This suggests that there would be a strong demand for the development of more clearly defined models for valid inter-company comparison, based on known assumptions. This is not a simple problem to solve and it may well be that simultaneous use of two or more different models might be necessary to make a satisfactory comparison. This might lead to the development of special models generally accepted for particular purposes – such as determining creditworthiness or potential for development and growth. Where an investor or lender required highly objective evidence, he could readily identify the accounting statements which would meet his purpose. If, alternatively, an assessment of economic realities such as current market value of the undertaking – necessarily more subjective – was desired, this too would be available by reference to the appropriate statements.

An auditor is subject to the combined pressures of professional ethics and legal requirements. He must be guided by the concept described in British countries as 'true and fair' and in America as 'in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles'. Undoubtedly it would be true in the present climate of professional opinion, legislation and current practice that no auditor could properly report in terms of unqualified approval on more than one set of accounting statements showing divergent results for the same period. There is no immediate solution to this problem. To prepare more than one set of accounts and to receive audit approval for only one is merely to emphasize the extent to which accounting is shackled to the illusory concept that there is 'one right way' for all purposes. What is required is a change in professional attitudes, recognizing that accounting does not comprise a single 'right' way, but is a tool which may produce many answers, each appropriate for a particular purpose. The function of the auditor in relation to this changed situation then becomes clear. His opinion should attest to the validity of a specific set of accounts subject to the basic assumptions on which they are prepared – these being expressly stated as an integral part of the presentation. The auditor might then properly express a favourable opinion on a variety of results, each based on a different model, after satisfying himself that each fully complied with the stated assumptions. The auditor would have the further duty, in relation to accounts circulated to shareholders, of ensuring that consistency was observed in the selection and use of models. Obviously it would be misleading to circulate a tax-accounting model one year and a price level adjusted model in the next, or to insert comparative figures not based on precisely the same assumptions. The work of the auditor should be assisted materially by the introduction of more clearly defined models. Many thorny problems arise under present conditions because of a conflict between the need for unfettered managerial judgement if the accounts are to be of value for such purposes as financial policy, and the requirement of objectivity desired for other uses, such as reporting to third parties. This conflict would be eliminated by the use of separate models, and the auditor could rightly insist on the fullest compliance with the defined conditions of each model.

Undoubtedly many accountants would have to undergo a minor mental revolution before accepting the idea that each of several sets of accounts for the same firm, showing different profits for the same period, were equally valid for their individual purposes. This line of thought, however, has been accepted widely in fields such as cost analysis and capital expenditure evaluation. Thus an N.A.A. research report states:

> 'The primary objective in the choice of a depreciation method is usefulness of the resulting costs for their intended purposes. Different purposes may call for different methods. That individual companies not infrequently employ different depreciation

[1] There is precedent for tax-dominated inventory valuation in New Zealand in the use of livestock standard values. These are useful for tax purposes and for trust accounting, but it is virtually impossible to justify their use for other accounting purposes.

Leonard Spacek, of Arthur Andersen & Co, also said:

'Even though accounting practices followed in reporting to the public, prescribed by law and regulation in many cases, produce untrue and misleading reports, such practices should not be allowed to colour or distort your internal management reports. Otherwise the internal reports you rely on to run your business will be equally misleading to you as managers, and will plant the seeds of business failure. Therefore, management reports on which you rely must always be geared to the truth of the facts, regardless of tradition or of generally accepted accounting principles used in public reporting.'[2]

Certainly selection of appropriate models will in many cases call for high professional skill and judgement. A period of experimentation within the profession with the use of different models may lead by a process of natural selection to some models becoming widely recognized as appropriate for particular purposes. This would assist accountants in the question of selection, but it would be undesirable in the extreme that ability to formulate new models should ever be barred, whether by custom or by legislation, as this would spell the end of the process of adaptation of accounting to new needs and demands. It should be noted that although models should be designed to meet the needs of their principal expected users, it is impossible to dictate exactly who ultimately shall have access to any particular accounting statement. This is a further reason why it is essential that the nature of the model used and its assumptions be clearly stated as part of each statement. This is a distinctly unusual procedure in accounting, although it is a well established practice among statisticians.

It cannot be denied that acceptance of the principle of multiple models must impose the need for much thought, research and education on the accounting profession. This should be regarded as a challenge rather than as a barrier to adopting new methods if they promise to eliminate defects in existing practice. Unless a profession is willing to accept such challenges and to explore fresh ways of aiding the community it can expect only to slip gradually down from true professional status.

The ability to furnish accounting statements based on varying assumptions must depend in great measure on the availability of suitably classified basic records. The wider the range of models it is desired to be able to produce on a systematic basis (that is, without the necessity for special ad hoc analysis of records not suitably designed for the purpose in view), the more complex is the system of classification likely to be, and the more extensive the number of items of information to be recorded. Fortunately there are three reasons why this factor need not preclude the use of a variety of models.

(a) The marginal or incremental cost of providing for an additional model may be low in many cases, representing only a small increase in total accounting costs and effort. This applies because a number of models would use much common data. As an example, a tax-accounting model and any other historical cost model would both presumably use the same data regarding cash movements, credit sales and purchases and most expenses. Thus the routine book-keeping task is unlikely to grow at anything approaching a rate proportionate to the increased number of models it can potentially service. However, there would be a relative increase in accounting activities of a responsible professional nature, such as selecting appropriate models and preparing statements based upon them.

(b) The more sophisticated models, particularly those relating to price level adjustments and current valuation of specific assets, would almost certainly demand a considerable increase in the complexity of the recording system. This would be offset largely by the fact that such models would be of value mainly to the larger organizations which should be better able to meet such increased demands. It would seem probable that the value of this type of adjustment would be less significant for small businesses and the instances in which it should be provided for less common. Public companies and their subsidiaries, and other comparable undertakings, could be expected to be the main users – by reason both of size and of the extent of their relationship with the investing public.

(c) A major influence in making more complex systems of classification economically feasible is the increasing availability of computers to undertake the task of recording and retrieving accounting data. It is only with data handling capacity of the order that computers can provide that it becomes possible to move from the idea of an accounting system being a production line with a single end-product, to the concept of an information bank from which can be drawn in appropriate form data relevant for any purpose. It is well within the scope of existing computer technology to store in readily accessible form virtually all the accounting and statistical data which could conceivably be required by the management of a firm in planning and guiding its activities. To make the information bank concept operational a comprehensive classification system must also be devised. This must recognize the range of possible types of decision and so classify data that material relevant to each type can be extracted without the need for additional analysis. This subject of information systems is so potentially fruitful that accountants cannot afford to ignore it as a field for intensive research. It is not intended to convey the impression that large-scale computer systems are a necessary prerequisite to the adoption of diversified accounting models. This is certainly not the case, but computers are opening the way to more elaborate development of such an approach.

Thus there is reason to believe that cost and complexity should not be accepted as a justification for rejecting the idea of alternative sets of accounting results. As with decisions on the design of accounting systems in existing circumstances, the question in each individual case must be resolved by balancing the expected increase in costs of operating the system against an assessment of the value of the additional information made available. It is important, however, that business be made fully aware of the need to place a reasonably high value on ensuring a well informed investing public. Accountants have a responsibility to see that this issue is faced squarely by company managements. Almost certainly failure to meet the growing demand by this section of the community for better information will induce legislation which could have an adverse effect on the flexibility and further development of accounting. This, in turn, would react to the disadvantage of business itself.

It has become almost habitual for the professional accounting bodies, and other defenders of the currently accepted accounting model, when attention is called to its more obvious shortcomings, to take refuge in the suggestion that any difficulties can be met by the use of supplementary schedules or statements. Typical statements include:

'The committee therefore gives its full support to the use of supplementary financial schedules, explanations, or footnotes by which management may explain the need for retention of earnings.'[1]

'Management may properly include in periodic reports to stockholders comprehensive supplementary statements which present the effects of the fluctuation in the value of the dollar upon net income and upon financial position. . . . Such supplementary statements should be . . . regarded as an extension or elaboration of the primary statements rather than as a departure therefrom.'[2]

Reference has been made[3] already to the limited practical effect that these recommendations have had, yet there has been a marked increase in the volume of criticism voiced because such information is not available. This evidence suggests that supplementary statements are not an adequate answer to the problem. In fact the device of supplementary statements leaves untouched the real issues with which this paper is concerned. It retains the traditional ill-defined model as the exclusive 'accepted' method. Because this model must then be forced to serve a multitude of purposes it cannot be more precisely specified, so that users must continue to be in doubt about the operative assumptions in any particular set of accounts. Domination by this accepted model also has an inhibiting effect on both the development and the use of alternative models. Being granted only a 'second-class citizenship', these models do not inspire the interest or support which their potential utility merits. Thus accounting is deprived of an effective opportunity to diversify its services to the fullest degree.

6. Conclusion

The problems and limitations of accounting to which attention has been drawn in this paper are well known and have been widely discussed. The only excuse which can be advanced for raising the same issues once again is that effective solutions have not been found and that there is reason to suspect that some efforts to find them are being misdirected. The search for the perfect framework of accounting assumptions or postulates for all purposes is reminiscent of the medieval enthusiasm for an elixir of life which would cure all ills.

It cannot be pretended that this discussion presents any detailed blueprint for progress, or any tidy, all-inclusive, theoretical structure. It offers no easy way out of the difficulties, but there would surely be a degree of naïvety in expecting simple solutions in the light of the increasing complexity of business activity and the consequent demand for a greater variety of more relevant information. What is suggested is a means of breaking out of the 'straight-jacket' of a single model with its inherent limitations and so tapping the true potential of accounting as a flexible information system.

Although the ultimate advantages, in terms of increased service to business and to the community at large, are great, the problems of transition to this broader conception of accounting will require careful attention. In the past much of the progress in accounting has occurred as a reaction to disastrous revelations of its deficiencies.[4] Every effort should be directed towards avoiding this form of 'progress through disaster'. The first essential is acceptance within the profession of a change of attitude away from the 'one right way' philosophy. The legitimacy of the concept of a range of accounting models, each valid for particular purposes, and the consequent need to state explicitly in each case the particulars of the model used could then be recognized. This would open the way for improved presentation, disclosing the nature of the assumptions employed, and for experimentation in the development of new models and applications. A concerted effort to re-educate the public – in particular investors, managers and other major users of accounting data – away from the myth of infallibility would also be essential.

The rate of improvement in accounting should increase dramatically since new techniques would no longer be rejected or resisted on the ground that they were unsuitable for some purposes although clearly of value for others. The test of universal applicability would be unnecessary. Thus, shorn of its outworn rigidity and granted the same flexibility which marks such other quantitative tools as mathematics and statistics, accounting could better serve business and the community.

Weekly Notes

IRISH INSTITUTE'S NEW SECRETARY

THE Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland have announced the appointment of Mr Colin Ernest Polden, A.C.A., as Secretary of the Institute in place of Mr W. Stuart Orr, B.A., LL.B., A.C.A., who has resigned.

Mr C. E. Polden

Mr Polden, who is aged 47, was educated at Wesley College, Dublin, where he was head prefect and Captain of Rugby in 1934–35. He was articled in December 1935 to the late Mr Thomas J. Morrison, of Dublin, and was admitted to Associate membership of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland in January 1941. After qualifying he joined Messrs Craig, Gardner & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Dublin, where he remained for six months before enlisting in the Royal Navy as an ordinary seaman. He was later commissioned as Sub-Lieutenant, R.N.V.R., and served for two years in the Mediterranean, being promoted Lieutenant, and in 1943 was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross.

After demobilization he returned to the service of Craig, Gardner & Co for a few months before joining Aspro-Nicholas of Ireland Ltd as Accountant in May 1946. Four years later he became assistant Secretary/Accountant and in April 1956 was appointed Secretary/Chief Accountant of Aspro-Nicholas.

Mr Polden, who is married with a son and a daughter, retains an interest in his former school, and was President of the Wesley College Old Boys' Union in 1963.

WINDING-UP RULES NEED REFORM

ALTHOUGH the current company winding-up rules were promulgated in 1949, they largely repeat the rules drawn up in 1890. In pointing this out, a memorandum by the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales recently submitted to the Board of Trade and reproduced as an appendix to the Council's report for 1964, recalls that in submitting its evidence to the Jenkins Committee on Company Law Reform, the Council suggested that after the work of the Committee was completed, the Companies (Winding-up) Rules 1949 should be examined, and the Council offered to assist by putting forward suggestions for amending the rules.

Among the detailed proposals contained in the memorandum, which is no doubt being studied by the Board of Trade, one is that only solicitors and persons authorized for appointment as auditors under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1948, should be appointed as liquidators, except in the case of a members' voluntary winding-up. Another is that in a members' voluntary winding-up the directors should produce accounts from the last balance sheet date to the commencement of the winding up.

The memorandum also states, feelingly, that some provision should be made to protect records from being thrown into disorder by the practice of stripping filing cabinets and ledger binders of their contents for the purpose of auctioning the equipment.

There are recommendations about the remuneration of liquidators, and about the proving of debts. Certainly when one considers the regulations in the light of the majority of liquidations, they bear a distinctly old-world flavour and must generate a good deal of needless expense. As the memorandum points out, the regulations could be better arranged so as to make it clear when they are dealing with compulsory liquidations and when with voluntary ones.

A further memorandum on company law amendment – additional to the evidence previously submitted by the Institute to the Jenkins Committee – has also been presented to the President of the Board of Trade. This will be reproduced in full and commented upon in next week's issue.

ANOTHER REVENUE DIRECTION FAILS

THE omnibus anti-dividend-stripping provisions contained in section 28 make a somewhat terrifying document and have been anathemized as amounting to taxation at the whim of the Inland Revenue. However, directions so far made under the section have not been conspicuously successful. First there was C.I.R. v. Parker (43 A.T.C. 294), where the Special Commissioners and again the Court of Appeal discharged directions. Now there are C.I.R. v. Cleary and C.I.R. v. Perrens where, on April 13th, the High Court upheld decisions by the Special Commissioners discharging directions under section 28.

The taxpayers were two sisters who held the whole issued capital of two companies, Gleeson Developments Ltd and M. J. Gleeson Ltd, which carried on business as property-holding companies. Gleeson Developments Ltd had a credit balance on profit and loss account of £180,000, of which £130,000 was represented by cash at the bank. In July 1961, the sisters sold all the shares in M. J. Gleeson Ltd to Gleeson Developments Ltd ('G.D.') for full consideration and received £121,000 cash from G.D.

The Revenue contended that the £121,000 represented money available for distribution by way of dividend which would otherwise have been subject to tax in the hands of the shareholders; that the taxpayers had obtained a tax advantage in that they received it as capital and that this tax advantage should be cancelled pursuant to section 28. The Revenue relied on section 28 (2) (d), and argued that the £121,000 should be grossed up at the standard rate and charged to surtax in the hands of the recipients. The Court rejected the taxpayers' argument that the payment of cash was not a 'transfer of assets'. However, it accepted the argument that

by An Industrious Accountant

CHAPTER 273

OUR young assistant departmental accountant has resigned in order to take up another position which would give him greater scope for initiative and enterprise and an enhanced share of executive responsibility. So he said when tendering his resignation. I hope he won't be disappointed. Every accountancy job automatically entails some proportion of routine work in assembling and scrutinizing masses of figures, and young men dreaming of a career embodying the more exciting features of Carnegie, Rothschild and Clive of India are doomed to disappointment.

The erstwhile A.D.A.'s best friend and colleague organized the usual office collection to buy him a parting gift. This procedure, invariable when staff leave us, used once to be marked by a rapacious energy reminiscent of Guthrum the Dane levying blackmail upon some reluctant ealdorman, but is now a more civilized operation. Some years ago the managing director decreed a strict upper limit of five shillings for contributions, following an exodus of middle-level staff which sorely mulcted their loyal subordinates. His decree was welcomed at all levels . . . it was assumed, regrettably, by all and sundry that such exalted personages as company accountants-cum-secretaries must give nothing less than paper money – an expensive status symbol in my case.

The friend and colleague scoured the highways and byways of the office, being conscious that the total of the collection would depend entirely on his energy. He did well. The staff in most departments paid up generously and the departing accountant chose a handsome briefcase as his present.

It was a fine hogskin affair with his initials emblazoned in gold; the recipient literally blushed with pride when he saw it unwrapped. He'd never had such a 'smasher' before, he admitted, in a burst of self-revelation; really it was positively luxurious. As he fingered the zipper of the outside pocket he seemed to stand taller as if the director-model case emphasized his status.

The transition from the coloured cardboard folder borne by articled clerks, via the little attaché case of previous decades to the sophistication of the modern briefcase, is perhaps a symbol of the profession's progress. To the individual, at least, it opened a new chapter in his life.

I well remember my own first briefcase. It was a totally unexpected present. At the time I was in charge of the secretarial section of the firm of auditors where I worked, and much of my time was occupied in setting up the office and accountancy systems of the new firms which we administered in their initial stages. For months I had been buying stationery, desks, chairs, typewriters and so on, from a firm of business suppliers . . . when their salesman suddenly produced this gift; I was overwhelmed. The smooth black leather, the brass clasp, the buckled straps . . . it went everywhere with me for weeks.

One day the stout, elderly manager of one of our new companies visited me. He wanted an office safe, he said, so I introduced him to the salesman. My first shock came when the manager, eschewing polite formalities, bluntly demanded discount off the listed price; I blushed for his uncouth ignorance. My second shock came when the salesman agreed smilingly to a 5 per cent cut for a good customer, and another 5 per cent for prompt cash, following this up with an invitation to a sumptuous lunch when the manager asked vaguely about a battery of expensive steel filing cabinets with accessories. They settled down to talk business like old friends. I'd been paying the full invoice charges all the while past without thought of questioning them. That smooth-spoken salesman had profited nicely from my gullibility; the thought soured the lunch for me.

I scarcely used my briefcase thereafter; when I opened its capacious mouth it seemed to say scoffingly: 'Greenhorn! Fancy a would-be millionaire being too raw to fight for a bargain!' As Shakespeare remarked: 'Man, proud man! Dressed in a little brief authority.'

there was no tax advantage within the meaning of sections 28 and 43 of the Finance Act, 1960. It rejected a Revenue argument that the £121,000 was in substance a simple payment, since the sisters remained the beneficial owners of M. J. Gleeson Ltd through their ownership of all the share capital of G.D. Mr Justice Pennycuick said (according to The Times of April 14th) that he was not entitled to go behind the face of the transaction and treat the purchase money as a gratuitous payment.

PARLIAMENTARY QUESTIONS

PLANS to set up a State-run unit trust will be raised in the Commons on May 4th. Mr Joel Barnett (Labour, Heywood and Royton) has tabled a question asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his study of this project, to consider setting up a series of State-run unit trusts covering the differing yields and degree of risk which different types of small investor would be prepared to take.

A call for more easily understood legislation is to be made by Mr Hector Hughes (Labour, Aberdeen North), a lawyer, in a question to the Chancellor on May 4th. He will ask Mr Callaghan to take steps 'pending the comprehensive legislation on law reform planned by the Government, to simplify the language used in the legislation now in preparation'.

Action to rectify the various purchase-tax anomalies is being requested by a Liberal M.P., Mr Peter Bessell (Bodmin), in a question to the Chancellor; another M.P. will suggest that the Treasury should explore methods of affording special taxation relief to young couples in the very early stages of married life.

HIGHER EXPORTS FORECAST

A RISING production trend with higher exports is forecast in a survey published this week by the National Association of British Manufacturers.

The N.A.B.M.'s sample covered 502 companies and was carried out before the Budget. In consequence, there were references in the survey to the unsettling of business confidence by Budget uncertainties. A substantial majority thought the cut in the import surcharge from 15 to 10 per cent would have little beneficial effect on exports.

Increased production was concentrated in London, the Midlands and Scotland and was confined mainly to vehicles, textiles, chemicals and building materials. A marked decline was recorded in orders in the engineering and paper industries. But in the case of engineering an improvement in export orders and also in production is forecast for the second quarter of the year.

The survey records the efforts of industry to keep prices stable and there was, in fact, a slight slackening reported in the upward trend of costs, but no prospect of the trend being reversed.

Finance and Commerce

Development Stage

'AT this stage in the group's development the directors consider that members will appreciate the full details contained in the present report', says Mr Ronald B. Ogden, F.C.A., chairman of The Bath and Portland Group, commenting on the new form of presentation of the company's accounts and the additional information provided. Trading results are subdivided into four main classifications for the first time and the figures in the 'Analysis of group sales and profits' are included in this week's reprint of the accounts.

Presumably in future years comparison will be given and the figures could, with advantage, be dovetailed with the 'Ten-year financial summary' which shows the pace of growth of the group. Just why shareholders should appreciate full details 'at this stage' rather than at any previous stage in the group's development may not be particularly clear.

The annual meeting of the company, held on Budget Day, was the company's seventy-seventh but it is not entirely coincidence that 'the stage for full details' has been reached at the same time that the London Stock Exchange has called for fuller company reporting. The fact is that the group has expanded very considerably into new fields in the past few years.

Group Growth

It is interesting to trace the growth of the group since its incorporation in 1887 as a group of limestone quarries. Stone masonry was added later and, as Mr Ogden recounts, there subsequently emerged reconstructed stone and concrete products, followed by the present structural yet decorative building units. From there to the building industry itself was a natural step achieved by the acquisition in the past year of the Dudley Coles companies and the initiation of housing schemes for which certain of the group's existing properties were ripe.

By-products from the stone businesses led into the marketing of crushed limestone, aggregates and other industrial minerals, and into ready-mixed concrete on the one hand and the supply and spreading of finely ground agricultural limestone on the other. The latter activity has since been

10. Excess Cost of Shares in Subsidiaries
This represents the excess of the cost of shares in subsidiaries over the amount attributed to the net assets of those companies at the date of acquisition, less amounts written off.
The shares issued as part purchase consideration for new businesses acquired during the year have been valued at par and with the cash consideration amounted in total to less than the book value of the net assets acquired by £27,899. This amount, together with the surplus (£104,736) on revaluation of freehold properties of new subsidiaries acquired in the previous year, has been also written off the excess cost of shares in subsidiaries, to leave a balance of £519,891, after allowing for the goodwill of the Westhoughton ready-mixed concrete plant purchased for cash.

11. Interests of Outside Shareholders in Subsidiaries
The increase in 1964 reflects the interests of the holders of the 100,000 5 per cent Cumulative Redeemable Preference Shares of £1 each in Rustproof Metal Window & Engineering Company Limited. The Holding Company has given an undertaking to redeem or acquire these shares not later than 30th June 1969 on terms equivalent to 21/- for each share plus any arrears of dividends.

12. Stocks and Work in Progress
No concise statement of the bases and methods used in valuation is practicable, but the amount has been determined for the whole of the stocks and work in progress at the balance sheet date on bases and by methods of computation which are considered appropriate in the circumstances of the business and have been applied consistently.

13. Trade Investments
These are included at cost and are considered by the Directors to have not less than that value.

Freehold properties are included at the amounts of independent valuations between 1960 and 1964 with additions at cost. Leasehold properties and plant and equipment are included at cost.

The excess of valuation of freehold land and buildings over their net book amounts at the date of valuation was £555,697: no depreciation has been written off in respect of such excess as, in the opinion of the Directors, the aggregate value of such properties is not less than the amount at which they appear in the balance sheets.

The Holding Company has guaranteed debentures (since repaid) and bank overdrafts of subsidiaries amounting at the balance sheet date to £1,303,232.

extended into liquid fertilizers and into a 'unique system' of animal nutrition needing highly specialized laboratory services and equipment.

The third prong of development into engineering originated with the group's own stone masonry plant requirements and broadened to take in allied ranges of machinery needed by other industries, instrumentation for controls of many kinds and specialized argicultural and other machines.

Overlap

Trading results, as the reprint shows, are subdivided into minerals, building, agriculture and engineering. Within these sections, Mr Ogden says, the group's varied operations overlap and further division is not practicable. 'In fact it is a constant process to rationalize them and the ever-increasing number of companies constituting the group, at present exceeding seventy, the majority of which are still active.'

Until now, group expansion has been financed by share issues after temporary borrowing from the bank. It is considered, however, that fully £2 million of the bank loans shown in the accounts is permanently required and the company has placed £2 million of 6¾ per cent debenture stock.

This, it is calculated, will leave the group with an ample margin for financing further development. Current year capital expenditure, as at present planned, is broadly contained within the expected total of depreciation and other retained profits. Bank borrowing should therefore be confined primarily to seasonal and other temporary requirements.

ARITHMETICALLY-MINDED shareholders in A. & S. Henry & Co Ltd probably began doing sums when they read Mr Frank Winterbottom's statement with the company's 1964 accounts. They probably began at the point where the chairman said that of the year's group profits 'some 61 per cent' came from mail order subsidiaries, and carried on to the point where Dundee jute interests 'contributed some 24 per cent of our earnings'.

Making the total 85 per cent so far, shareholders then moved on to 'calico printing represents 7 per cent of our group profit' and 'general making-up activities represent some 7 per cent of the group figure'. That seems to account for 99 per cent of profits, but then Mr Winterbottom adds that 'the box-making unit and our paper merchanting and converting contributed 4 per cent towards results' so that the group somehow seemed to have made 103 per cent profits during the year.

There may be an answer to the problem in the fact that the company's Bradford subsidiary 'involved us in a loss'. But whatever the answer really is, there seems to be room in the A. & S. Henry report for a tabulation of the source of profits rather than the incorporation of the profit percentages in the chairman's statement.

CITY NOTES

THE problems of the effect of corporation tax on companies operating substantially overseas and of the need and scope for a reduction in Bank rate have developed as the two main post-Budget investment features. The two oil giants, British Petroleum and Shell Transport, have led the attack on the loss of overseas tax relief that corporation tax entails and have put their case with such vigour that hopes have arisen of some amendment to the position as outlined in the Budget.

Bank rate hopes are mainly pinned on the point that sterling now looks strong enough to withstand a lower protective Bank rate, and also on the evidence that Bank rate, at its current level, is beginning to have a strongly deflationary impact on the economy.

The general position in the stock-markets, however, is still one of indecision. The institutions are waiting for the Finance Bill and the rank and file of investors are still waiting for their stockbrokers to make positive investment suggestions against the background of the change that the Budget has brought to investment conditions as a whole.

THE INSTITUTE OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS IN ENGLAND AND WALES

REPORT OF THE COUNCIL FOR 1964

Extracts from the Annual Report of the Council which is to be presented to the eighty-fourth annual meeting of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales to be held on Wednesday, May 12th, 1965, at 10.30 a.m., in the Assembly Hall, Church House, Westminster, London SW1.

Royal Charters and Bye-laws

1. Five resolutions for amendment of the Royal Charters and bye-laws were passed at a special meeting of the Institute held on May 6th, 1964. Recommendations 1, 2, 3 and 5 which involved alterations to clauses of the supplemental Royal Charter were confirmed at a special meeting of the Institute on July 1st, 1964. The alterations to the supplemental Royal Charter were allowed by Her Majesty in Council on October 15th, 1964, and the alterations to the bye-laws were allowed by the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council on the same date. The necessary amendments to section A of the Members' Handbook were issued as part of supplement No. 14 on December 9th, 1964.

2. The purpose of the amendments to the supplemental Royal Charter and bye-laws was to enable the Institute:

(a) to implement proposals relating to schemes for a Certificate in Management Information and for a Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services (see however paragraphs 83 to 86)

(b) to substitute a system of proxy voting in place of the former postal ballot procedure and to increase the minimum period of notice for convening meetings of the Institute.

3. It had been intended to hold a special meeting of the Institute on July 14th, 1965, to consider proposals for further amendments to the supplemental Royal Charter and bye-laws relating inter alia to:

(a) the status of incorporated accountant members (paragraph 16)

(b) an increase in the admission fee and in annual subscriptions (paragraph 127)

(d) the size of the Council (paragraph 10).

Counsel however advise that in view of the complexity of the necessary amendments to the Royal Charters and bye-laws, it will not be practicable to have the required documents available in time for a meeting in mid-July. Having regard to the holiday season, the Council has decided that the special meeting for the above purposes should be held on September 23rd, 1965.

Co-option to Committees and Sub-Committees of the Council

9. The expansion of the activities of the Institute in recent years has resulted in a substantial increase in the burden of work carried out voluntarily by members of the Council involving the sacrifice of considerable time during normal working hours. If the Council is to continue to provide a standard of service to members which will enable the Institute to maintain its leading role in the accountancy profession, there will inevitably be in future years an even greater expansion of the work of the Council. Having reviewed the present burden of work, the Council has decided that the policy of co-opting members other than Council members to committees and sub-committees should be extended. Forty-four members have been co-opted to committees of the Council since June 1964. This number does not include members serving on sub-committees or on the Technical Advisory Committee and its sub-committees.

Increase in the Size of the Council

10. In addition to the foregoing co-options and in the light of the circumstances mentioned in the previous paragraph the Council intends to place before members at the special meeting on September 23rd, 1965 (see paragraph 3), a resolution proposing an increase in the number of members of the Council.

Council and Committee Meetings

11. During the year 1964 the Council met on eleven occasions. The number of meetings of committees and sub-committees totalled 227 as follows:

Applications	11
Articled Clerks	12
Consultative Committee of Members in Commerce and Industry	8
Courses	5
Disciplinary	8
District Societies	5
Education	9
Examination	8
Finance	12
General Purposes	12
Investigation	12
Library	5
Overseas Relations	5
Parliamentary and Law	12
Public Relations	10
Research	3
Special committees and sub-committees of standing committees	90

The foregoing table does not include meetings with representatives of other bodies on matters requiring joint consideration; nor does it include Technical Advisory Committee meetings.

Incorporated Accountant Members

16. The Council approved the following statement which was reproduced in Accountancy for April 1965 and in The Accountant of March 13th, 1965:

(1) 'Following the annual meeting on May 6th, 1964, the Council has given further consideration to the representations that incorporated accountant members should be permitted to call themselves "chartered accountants". The Council intends to submit to members at a special meeting to be held on July 14th, 1965 (date changed – see note below), proposals to amend the Royal Charters and bye-laws in order to modify the present position of incorporated accountant members.

(2) 'The Council intends to propose, inter alia, that with some exceptions persons who are or may become members and who are entitled only to be designated incorporated accountants, may apply for redesignation as chartered accountants and to use the letters A.C.A. or F.C.A. as appropriate.

(3) 'The exceptions, in the main, relate to incorporated accountant members practising in the United Kingdom. Such members will not be eligible for redesignation unless:

(1) they were so practising as their main occupation before February 1st, 1965; or

(2) at the time of application they are able to satisfy a requirement of appropriate experience in the United Kingdom for a period of thirty months in the office(s) of another person or persons in practice in the United Kingdom.

(4) 'An incorporated accountant member who is redesignated and who practises subsequently in the United Kingdom will lose his redesignation as a chartered accountant and the right to use the letters A.C.A. or F.C.A. unless or until such member can comply with one or other of the requirements in paragraph 3. A member not entitled to redesignation may describe himself as an incorporated accountant member of the Institute and use the letters A.S.A.A. or F.S.A.A. as appropriate.'

Note. For the reason given in paragraph 3, the date of the special meeting has been changed to September 23rd, 1965.

Membership Changes

17. The number of members of the Institute on January 1st, 1965, was 39,293, an increase of 1,413 since January 1st, 1964.

18. The number of new members admitted during the year 1964 was 1,788. Thirteen former members resumed membership, two through re-admission after resignations, two after a period of suspension from membership and nine following revocation of exclusion. Under clause 22 of the supplemental Royal Charter, twenty-six members were excluded (twenty-four of them for non-payment of subscription) and two members were suspended from membership for a period of one year. Eight applications for revocation of exclusion from membership and two applications for admission to membership were refused. The resignations of eighty-three members were reported and the resignation of one member tendered under bye-law 38 was not accepted. The deaths of 277 members were reported.

Fellowship

20. During the year 1964, 137 associates became fellows on the basis of five years' practice and 959 associates became fellows on January 1st, 1965, having completed ten years' membership.

Incorporated Accountant Members F.S.A.A.

21. During the year 1964 the Council approved applications under clause 4 (b) of the Scheme of Integration from four incorporated accountant members A.S.A.A. to use the letters F.S.A.A. Fifty incorporated accountant members A.S.A.A. became incorporated accountant members F.S.A.A. on January 1st, 1965, having completed ten years' membership.

Incorporated Accountant Members becoming Associates

22. During the year 1964 the Council approved applications from thirteen incorporated accountant members to become associates in accordance with clause 6 of the Scheme of Integration.

Appointments Register

34. There was a further considerable decline in the number of members who were enrolled on the appointments register in 1964 as compared with 1963 but not however in the number of members placed through the register. The number of vacancies notified during the year again rose appreciably. The wide demand for young members which has prevailed for some years past increased during 1964 and names could not be submitted for many vacancies. Another notable feature of the year was the sharp rise in the starting salaries offered to these members, especially in the latter half of the year.

Examination Results

36. Intermediate and Final examinations under the old syllabus were held in May and November 1964. The first Intermediate examination under the new syllabus was held in September 1964. The results are summarized as follows:

	Passed	Failed	Total Candidates	Comparative totals 1963
Old Intermediate – May and November.. ..	1,397	1,404	2,801	4,687
New Intermediate – September ..	1,433	1,318	2,751	—
*Old Final – May and November	1,769	2,092	3,861	3,601
Totals ..	4,599	4,814	9,413	8,288

*The Final examination under the new syllabus will be held in 1965 as follows:

May 1965: Part I only

November 1965: Parts I and II.

The Council wishes to place on record its appreciation of the administrative work undertaken by district societies in connection with the examination centres at Birmingham, Bristol, Cardiff, Leeds, Liverpool, London, Manchester, Newcastle upon Tyne and Nottingham.

Preliminary Certificate

39. As mentioned in paragraph 45 of the last report, the Preliminary examination was held for the last time in November 1963. Candidates wishing to commence articled service are required to produce evidence that they have attained the necessary educational standard leading to the grant by the Institute of a Preliminary certificate before entry into articles. 3,429 such certificates were issued during 1964.

Consent to take an Articled Clerk

43. Since January 1st, 1964, every member wishing to take an articled clerk for the first time has been required under bye-law 48 to obtain the consent of the Articled Clerks Committee, for which purpose an interview is necessary. In a letter dated June 11th, 1964, sent to all members practising in the United Kingdom attention was drawn to the importance of applications being made in good time, preferably at least two months before the member wishes to sign articles, although an application should not be submitted until such member is in practice within the United Kingdom as his main occupation. Apart from exceptional circumstances, for example where new articles are signed or a transfer is executed because a former principal has died, retired or otherwise ceased to be competent to retain an articled clerk, service with a member may not be calculated from a date earlier than that on which the consent of the Articled Clerks Committee is given.

Articles of Clerkship

44. Registrations. During the year 1964 the number of articles of clerkship registered was 3,511 compared with 3,549 in 1963.

Contracts of Employment Act, 1963

47. As the obligations of employers under the Contracts of Employment Act, 1963, had been the subject of notes for guidance issued by the Ministry of Labour, the Council decided that specific guidance to members was called for only in the case of articled clerks, who are employees within the terms of the Act. The text of suggested paragraphs for inclusion in the statement prescribed under the Act to introduce references to the articles of clerkship and the Royal Charters and bye-laws, by which the terms of employment are governed, was circulated on June 11th, 1964, to all members in practice in the United Kingdom.

Study Leave

48. At its meeting on December 2nd, 1964, the Council authorized for publication the following statement which appeared in Accountancy for January 1965 [and The Accountant, December 12th, 1964]:

'The Council approved the proposal of the Articled Clerks Committee that the committee should accept for registration in the following circumstances articles of clerkship in which the prescribed periods of study leave have been reduced. The period of nine weeks' leave other than immediately before examinations may, with the consent of the parties, be reduced by any period spent by the articled clerk in following an acceptable introductory course as an employee of his principal's firm before the first day of his service under articles. When the articles are submitted for registration, they should be accompanied by a letter specifying the course attended, with dates.'

49. The following statement relating to candidates for the new Final examination was authorized by the Council at its meeting on January 6th, 1965, and published in Accountancy for February 1965 [and The Accountant, January 16th, 1965]:

'The Council has been legally advised that the study leave provisions in articles signed before November 27th, 1963, give rise to an anomaly in that a clerk who attempts on separate occasions the two parts of the new Final examination is entitled to a minimum of one month's full-time leave before he sits for each part; whereas a clerk who attempts both parts together is strictly entitled to a minimum of one month's full-time leave only before the examination.

'In the opinion of the Council, it is undesirable that entitlement to study leave shall differ according to the manner in which a clerk presents himself for examination. The Council therefore recommends that clerks articled before November 27th, 1963, shall be granted, as a minimum, pre-examination leave at the rate of four weeks in respect of each part of the Final examination, whether the parts are taken separately or together.

'Articles entered into on or after November 27th, 1963, provide expressly for leave on the basis recommended above.'

Grants from Local Education Authorities

50. Some local education authorities are prepared to make grants to articled clerks towards tuition expenses. It is therefore the practice of the Institute, when returning articles after registration, to draw attention to the possibility of such grants.

Recruitment

54. At the request of the Department of Technical Co-operation (now the Ministry of Overseas Development) and of the Overseas Students Advisory Bureau the Institute has participated in 1964 in discussions on the problems of professional training in the United Kingdom of students from the economically developing countries of the world, in particular the Commonwealth and former Commonwealth countries. Whilst the acceptance by members of the Institute of oversea students as articled clerks has for some time continued at the rate of between one in ten and one in twelve of all entering articles in each year, a ratio which compares not unfavourably with that of oversea to United Kingdom undergraduates at universities, there remains a substantial unsatisfied demand for articles of clerkship. Any practitioner, particularly in London and other principal cities, who is willing to accept a student from overseas, is asked to write to the Secretary of the Institute, where a register is maintained of students who are eligible to enter articles and are available for interview. The name of an oversea student is not given to a member unless such student has had a preliminary interview at the Institute.

55. There has been a further extension of visits to United Kingdom universities to advise undergraduates who wish to discuss entry into articles. In the academic year 1963–64, 11 universities were visited and 94 students were interviewed. In 1964–65 the totals were 14 and 106 respectively.

Education

58. Courses of oral tuition. The policy of promoting courses of oral tuition for articled clerks has been pursued with the assistance of district societies, colleges of further education and the Department of Education and Science. A list of courses available from January to September 1965 was published in Accountancy for February1965 [and The Accountant, January 30th, 1965]. Further lists will be published from time to time. The Council attaches great importance to the attendance of articled clerks at introductory courses at an early stage of training, if need be even before the signing of articles (see paragraph 48).

61. Education newsletter. The first issue of a quarterly newsletter on educational topics of interest to the profession was made in March 1965 to universities, colleges of further education, the education sub-committees of district societies and to others interested in education and training. Copies of this and future issues may be obtained, without charge, from the offices of the Institute.

The Universities and the Accountancy Profession

62. Conference. A conference attended by members of the Joint Standing Committee of the Universities and the Accountancy Profession and representatives of local joint committees of accountants and university representatives was held at the University of Nottingham from April 17th to 19th, 1964. This was the seventh conference to be held. A feature was the attendance of members of the academic staff from the new universities which are not at present represented on the Joint Standing Committee.

63. Chairman of the Joint Standing Committee. Dr J. M. Whittaker, M.A., D.SC., F.R.S., Vice-Chancellor of the University of Sheffield, who had been chairman of the Joint Standing Committee since 1953, retired from the chair at the conclusion of the Joint Standing Committee's conference in April 1964. Mr C. F. Carter, M.A., Vice-Chancellor of the University of Lancaster, was elected to succeed Dr Whittaker.

64. Joint Standing Committee's booklet. Details of the degree courses approved by the Council under bye-law 68 are given in the booklet The Universities and the Accountancy Profession issued by the Joint Standing Committee. The current edition covers the university session October 1965 to July 1966.

65. University of Wales (University College, Aberystwyth). At its meeting on December 2nd, 1964, the Council approved under bye-law 68 a new degree course at University College, Aberystwyth, which includes accountancy, economics and law. The college, which is one of the four constituent colleges of the University of Wales, joins University College, Cardiff, as a member of the Joint Standing Committee.

66. Exemption from the Intermediate examination. During 1964, 134 applications for exemption from the Intermediate examination under bye-law 88 (a) were determined.

Courses Committee

68. The name of the Summer Course Committee has been changed to the Courses Committee and its terms of reference extended to include, in addition to responsibility for the present summer courses, responsibility for the administrative arrangements of other courses for members which may be approved by the Council.

Summer Courses

70. 1965. Summer courses are to be held at Christ Church and Merton College, Oxford, from July 15th to 20th, 1965, and at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, from September 15th to 19th, 1965. An application form giving details of these courses was sent to members on February 16th, 1965.

Electronic Data Processing Courses

71. These courses are intended to give members an introduction to computers and computer systems. Each course is divided into six main parts. The first part deals with the computer itself and the equipment which goes with it, and outlines the essentials of an electronic data processing system. The second part illustrates how an electronic data processing system is used whilst the third part describes the basic concepts of computer programming. The fourth shows how a computer system should be operated and controlled and leads to the fifth part which deals with the considerations to be taken into account when planning the audit of a computer system. The course ends with a review of the likely future developments and their impact on the auditor.

Other Courses

74. On February 16th, 1965, a questionnaire was sent to members asking them to notify the Secretary of the extent to which they would be interested in courses of an instructional nature on various subjects and whether they had any preference as to location and timing. The Council will decide in the light of the replies to the questionnaire whether or not to provide further courses.

District Societies

76. Membership. From January 1st, 1964, a member of the Institute has been eligible to apply to join the district society of his choice without payment of any local subscription. Between December 31st, 1962, and April 30th, 1964 (the latest date for which figures are available), the total membership of district societies increased from 17,068 to 24,667, a rise of 44 per cent.

77. New branches. The Council is pleased to record the formation of the following branches of district societies:

Lincoln and South Lincolnshire Branch of the Hull, East Yorkshire and Lincolnshire Society.

York Branch of the Leeds, Bradford and District Society.

78. Grants. In consequence of the substantial increase in the membership and the growing activities of district societies, together with the abolition of local subscriptions, grants amounting to £36,112 were paid to district societies in 1964; the amount paid in 1963 was £15,428.

The Practitioner Enquiry

82. As mentioned in paragraph 86 of the last report, copies of a report prepared by the District Societies Committee for consideration by the Council were issued on April 30th, 1964, to all members in practice in the United Kingdom and were also made available to other members on request. The report was based on information received from practising members as a result of an enquiry carried out in 1963. A special committee of the Council is examining the implications of the report.

Certificate in Management Information

Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services

83. Special meetings of members held on May 6th and July 1st, 1964, approved proposals for:

(a) an examination for a Certificate in Management Information, to be held jointly by the Institute and The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland.

(b) a Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services, to be administered jointly by the Institute, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants.

Allowance of the consequential alterations to the supplemental Royal Charter and bye-laws has been obtained (paragraphs 1 and 2). Booklets containing the schemes were sent to members on April 20th, 1964.

84. The necessary amendments to the Royal Charter and bye-laws of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, although agreed by members of that Institute in general meeting, require confirmation by poll and then approval by two Governments and it is uncertain when such approval will be given. The opportunity will be taken at a special meeting of the Institute to be held on May 12th, 1965, at the conclusion of the annual meeting to submit a resolution to permit the Institute to proceed with the implementation of the scheme for the Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services either with or without the participation of the Irish Institute.

85. The Certificate in Management Information. Although The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland is at present unable to participate in the scheme for the Certificate in Management Information for the reasons indicated in the previous paragraph it has been agreed that arrangements should proceed to hold the first examination for the Certificate in Management Information in October 1966, whether or not by that date the Irish Institute will be empowered to participate. The Council at its meeting on March 3rd, 1965, approved a statement for the information of prospective candidates, which appeared in Accountancy for April 1965 [and The Accountant, March 13th, 1965]. In addition, a questionnaire (paragraph 74) was sent to members on February 16th, 1965, asking them to notify the Secretary if they proposed to sit for the examination.

86. Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services. Preparatory work in connection with the Joint Diploma is being pressed forward by a Joint Committee representing the five bodies concerned, and it is hoped that the first Part I examination will be held in 1966. Further details of this examination and application forms for those qualified for exemption from the requirements of Part I of the scheme, under the transition arrangements, will be made available as soon as possible.

Professional Matters

87. During the year the Council has dealt with a large number of technical and professional matters. The paragraphs which follow report the main items and indicate the scope of the work undertaken.

Recommendations on Accounting Principles

88. Recommendation 23, Hire-purchase, Credit Sale and Rental Transactions, in the series of Recommendations on Accounting Principles was distributed to members on December 9th, 1964, as part of supplement No. 14 to the Members' Handbook (section N 23). The Recommendation has also been printed as supplement No. 3 to the loose-leaf publication Recommendations on Accounting Principles; copies of the supplement may be purchased from the Institute at the price of 2s 6d per copy post free. 90. Finance Act, 1964. A memorandum on the Finance Bill was submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on May 8th, 1964, and was discussed with members of the Board of Inland Revenue on May 29th, 1964, when the Institute was represented by Mr L. H. Clark, F.C.A., Mr E. N. Macdonald, D.F.C., F.C.A., and Mr J. E. Talbot, F.C.A.

91. Accountancy charges and short-term gains. Following correspondence with the Board of Inland Revenue the Council at its meeting on December 2nd, 1964, approved for publication a statement with reference to the tax treatment of accountancy charges incurred in connection with the computation of short-term gains under Case VII of Schedule D. The statement was published in Accountancy for January 1965 [and The Accountant, December 12th, 1964].

92. Proposed Corporation Tax and Capital Gains Tax. In response to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's invitation to representative bodies to submit points arising on his proposals to introduce corporation and capital gains taxes the Council submitted a memorandum on January 18th, 1965 [reproduced in The Accountant, February 27th, 1965].

Most advanced electronic calculator in existence?

Probably

Most beautifully designed?

Certainly

The new Friden* 130 Electronic Calculator is mid-way between a mechanical desk calculator and an electronic computer. It has no moving parts — all calculations are performed by solid-state electronic components, and entries and answers are displayed on a cathode ray tube like a miniature T.V. screen. It works in milliseconds and it works silently.

Operation of the 130 is through a very simple keyboard with clearly marked controls. Results appear on four registers making it possible to work on multistop problems in logical order without manually re-entering amounts. All entries and answers are automatically aligned around a selected decimal point. In classic simplicity and elegance of design, it is unmatched among today's office machines.

Interest on Clients' Money placed on Deposit

96. At its meeting on November 4th, 1964, the Council authorized the publication of the following statement, which appeared in Accountancy for December 1964 [and The Accountant, November 14th, 1964].

'The Council agreed that the attention of members should be drawn to the decision of the House of Lords in Brown v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue [1964] 3 All E.R. P.2, 119: [1964] 3 W.L.R. 511.

'The case concerned the right of a solicitor to claim earned income relief on interest received by him in respect of clients' money placed on deposit which was not allocated to or earmarked for any particular client. The House of Lords decided that such interest did not become the property of the solicitor, and the question whether it should rank as earned income therefore did not arise.

'The Council of the Institute has under consideration the implications of this decision both generally and in relation to members who themselves hold clients' money on deposit and members who report on solicitors' accounts under the Accountant's Certificate Rules, 1946. It is proposed to issue a further statement in due course.

'In consequence of the decision it seems clear that, if (although in compliance with The Law Society's previous statement that such action was permissible) interest received by a solicitor on clients' money in a mixed client deposit account has been credited to his office account, the accountant's certificate must be qualified in that respect.'

Local Government (Pecuniary Interests) Act, 1964

97. The Council at its meeting on August 5th, 1964, approved a statement on the Local Government (Pecuniary Interests) Act, 1964. This Act modifies, inter alia, the scope of section 76 of the Local Government Act, 1933, by providing that remote or insignificant interests which cannot reasonably be regarded as likely to influence members of local authority councils in consideration or discussion of or in voting on contracts or other matters shall not be treated as constituting pecuniary interests for the purposes of section 76. The statement was published in Accountancy for August 1964 [and The Accountant, August 15th, 1964] and circulated to members as part of supplement No. 14 to the Members' Handbook (section P 13).

The Stock Exchange, London

98. Rule 79a of the Rules of The Stock Exchange, London. The Council of the Institute was consulted by the Council of The Stock Exchange, London, as to consequential amendments to Rule 79a arising from the introduction of Rule 57e to permit members of the Stock Exchange to establish, with prior consent of the Council of The Stock Exchange, oversea branch offices, if desired in the form of limited or unlimited companies. Copies of the text of the amended Rule 79a were distributed to members on December 9th, 1964, as part of supplement No. 14 to the Members' Handbook (section (P 8).

99. Proposals of The Stock Exchange, London, regarding the disclosure of additional information by public quoted companies. The following statement was authorized by the Council at its meeting on December 2nd, 1964, and reproduced in Accountancy for January 1965 [and The Accountant, December 12th, 1964]:

'On November 20th, 1964, representatives of the Institute met representatives of the London Stock Exchange by invitation to discuss recent Stock Exchange proposals relating to the disclosure of additional information by public quoted companies.

'The Institute's representatives made it clear that the Council of the Institute fully shared the wish of the London Stock Exchange for more disclosure and for further improvement in standards of financial reporting. It was agreed that the Institute and the London Stock Exchange should have further meetings to continue the discussions on this and other matters of mutual interest.'

Technical Advisory Committee

104. Change of name. At its meeting on April 8th, 1964, the Council decided that, to avoid confusion with the recently established Research Committee, the name of the Taxation and Research Committee should be changed to the Technical Advisory Committee. Subsequently, following a recommendation of the Technical Advisory Committee, all regional committees made corresponding changes in their names.

107. Meetings and activities. During the year 1964 the Technical Advisory Committee held six meetings and its twenty sub-committees held sixty-six meetings. It assisted the Council, inter alia, in the preparation of Recommendation 23 Hire Purchase, Credit Sale and Rental Transactions (paragraph 88), Statements on Auditing No. 4 Internal Control and No. 5 Auditors' Reports on Group Accounts (paragraph 89) and in the drafting of memoranda on the Finance Bill, 1964 (paragraph 90), the Proposed Corporation Tax and Capital Gains Tax (paragraph 92), Company Law Amendment (paragraph 93) and proposals for Revision of the Companies Winding-up Law and Rules (paragraph 94). The committee also advised and rendered technical assistance in connection with the first course for members on electronic data processing. A number of special reports were prepared and many other matters are under active consideration. Throughout the year the committee continued to receive valuable assistance from the regional technical advisory committees of the district societies.

Research

108. The Research Committee has approved an initial list of subjects suitable for research. Approaches have been made to universities in respect of four subjects appropriate for study by university research workers who, it is intended, should receive a grant from the Research Foundation and be assisted by small advisory committees of members of the Institute.

Chartered Accountants Joint Standing Committee

111. The Overseas Accountancy Examinations Advisory Board established by the Chartered Accountants Joint Standing Committee exists to give advice and assistance in establishing and conducting accountancy examinations of oversea bodies. The Board co-operated with The Rhodesia Society of Accountants in connection with its Intermediate Final (Part I) and Final (Part II) examinations held in June 1964 and with The Malaysian Association of Certified Public Accountants in connection with its Intermediate examination held in December 1964. Since the last report the Board has entered into an arrangement with The Institute of Chartered Accountants (Ghana) whereby that Institute will receive the advice and assistance of the Board.

Overseas Matters

113. Friendly contact has been maintained with a great number of overseas bodies throughout the year and advice has been given freely to new organizations and to those concerned with the preparation of plans for the formation of new organizations, whenever requests have been received.

Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers (U.E.C.)

114. The Institute has continued to take a full part in the affairs of the Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers (U.E.C.) through its representatives in the Assembly of Delegates. At the meeting of the assembly in Vienna on August 29th, 1964, the Institute's delegates were Sir Thomas Robson, M.B.E., M.A., F.C.A., Mr S. J. Pears, F.C.A., and Mr G. B. Pollard, F.C.A. They also attended the meeting of the assembly in Wiesbaden on March 17th, 1965.

115. The term of office of Sir Thomas Robson, M.B.E., M.A., F.C.A., as a Vice-President of U.E.C. expired in 1964. At the meeting of the Assembly of Delegates held in Vienna in August 1964, he was re-elected a member of the Executive Committee (formerly the Exécutif des Présidents), which was enlarged at that meeting to a membership of nine. He attended meetings of the Executive Committee in Berlin, in Vienna, in Brussels and in Wiesbaden and, in his absence, was represented at meetings in Scheveningen by Mr C. A. Evan-Jones, M.B.E. (Joint Secretary), and in Paris by Mr S. J. Pears, F.C.A., as observers.

116. The fifth congress of U.E.C. was held in Vienna from August 31st to September 3rd, 1964. The theme was the contribution of accountants to the development of European business. Approximately two hundred members of the Institute, many accompanied by their ladies, attended. At a banquet held in the Wiener Hofburg on September 3rd, 1964, the President spoke on behalf of the countries which had joined U.E.C. since the fourth congress held in Zürich in 1961. Mr W. E. Parker, C.B.E., F.C.A., acted as a 'debater' at the session devoted to the theme The Possibility, Usefulness and Purpose of a Standardized European Plan of Accounts. The Record of Proceedings in English will be available in September 1965.

117. A series of study groups for which there will be a limited number of places available will be held under the auspices of U.E.C. in Baden-Baden in November 1966. Details will be announced in due course.

Ninth International Congress of Accountants, Paris, 1967

120. The Ninth International Congress of Accountants is to be held in Paris from September 7th to 12th, 1967. Under the title The New Horizons of Accounting the theme of the congress will be the future course of the profession. The Institute has agreed to arrange for members to make technical contributions to the congress.

Practice Rights Overseas

121. Legislation and other developments affecting the practice of accountancy and auditing in many countries overseas have been watched closely throughout the year. The Council has continued to advocate not only a liberal attitude towards world freedom of practice rights but also the removal of artificial barriers based upon nationality or residence and restrictions on partnerships, firm names or otherwise. Such barriers or restrictions are in the view of the Council detrimental to the future development of the profession and to the countries which impose them.

Eire Companies Act, 1963

122. The Secretary of the Department of Industry and Commerce in Dublin informed the Institute on August 31st, 1964, that the Minister for Industry and Commerce had afforded recognition to the Institute under subsection (1) (a) of section 162 of the Companies Act, 1963, subject to the following conditions:

(i) 'that recognition may be withdrawn by the Minister at any time;

(ii) 'that the Institute shall furnish to the Minister on request information regarding the holding of examinations, appointment of examiners, enforcement of discipline, etc.;

(iii) 'that the Institute shall furnish to the Minister a copy of any proposed alterations to the Charter or Bye-laws.'

Commonwealth Relations Office Conference

123. At the invitation of the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations a conference of professional bodies in Great Britain was held at Marlborough House on April 29th, 1964, at which the Institute was represented by Sir Thomas Robson, M.B.E., M.A., F.C.A. The conference was called to discuss links between the professional bodies in Great Britain which have significant Commonwealth membership or other Commonwealth ties, and their counterparts overseas, and to consider how these might be developed in the future. Sir Thomas informed the meeting that the Institute maintains close contacts with accountancy bodies overseas and helps to foster by advice and in other ways the formation and growth of new or young bodies with high professional and educational standards.

Moorgate Place Redevelopment

125. The Institute has recently completed the purchase for its headquarters building of the freehold interests in those properties which, together with the present freehold Hall and offices of the Institute, comprise the site bounded by Moorgate Place, Great Swan Alley, Copthall Avenue and Langthorne Court. Under the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, the enlarged building must retain the major architectural features of the existing Hall and offices. The outline plans and the general arrangement of accommodation and facilities within the new building were approved by the Council on November 4th, 1964, the same day on which the Government announced its decision to impose restrictions on office building in the London area. Applications for planning permission and for closure of alleyways running through the site are now dependent upon the grant of an Office Development Permit by the Board of Trade. Following the announcement in Parliament by the President of the Board of Trade that he would be prepared to receive applications for Office Development Permits in advance of the enactment of the related legislation, an application for such a permit has been submitted. Pending this redevelopment the Institute offices and committee rooms remain in the temporary premises at City House, 56/66 Goswell Road and Eileen House, 26/34 Old Street, London EC1. It has however proved possible for the Library to remain at Moorgate Place for the time being. The premises at 43 London Wall, of which the Institute has a lease, are now occupied by the Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London on a rental basis.

Form of Accounts

126. At the 1964 annual meeting the then President mentioned that the Council intended to introduce extensive changes in the presentation of the 1964 accounts in order to make them more informative. The audited accounts include a revised form of revenue account, supported by a schedule analysing net revenue expenditure by main functions after allocating accommodation and administration expenses between functions on statistical bases. The Council believes that this schedule gives a useful picture of the manner in which revenue is at present applied. Comparable figures for 1963 are not available in this form but it is intended to give comparative figures in future years.

Financial Position

127. When proposals for subscription increases were last before members in September 1963, it was stated in an explanatory memorandum issued by the Council that it was unlikely that the increases then proposed would result in a working margin of revenue after 1965. Although as shown by the accounts there was a surplus on Revenue Account in 1964, budget forecasts indicate that, after allowing for increased expenditure due in part to the increasing activities of the Institute, there would be only a very small surplus in 1965, before taking into account interest charges, and thereafter deficits, again before taking into account interest charges. The Council had hoped to defer for another year any proposals for subscription increases but two recent events have prevented this. As mentioned in paragraph 125 of this report, the Government is restricting office development in Central London and, while the Council hopes that the Institute's redevelopment scheme will be allowed to proceed, there could be some delay, resulting in increased interest charges to be borne in respect of capital expenditure already incurred. The second event was an unexpected opportunity to purchase the freehold of an adjoining property. The Council decided that it was in the long-term interests of the Institute to purchase the freehold of this property, notwithstanding that this would increase the capital commitment not only by the purchase price but also by the amount which under the leasehold arrangements originally envisaged would have been contributed by the owner of the freehold towards the redevelopment but which must now be found by the Institute. The combined effect of the foregoing is that the Institute will incur much greater interest charges on borrowing than had previously been estimated and therefore proposals for increases in the admission fee and subscriptions will be placed before members at the special meeting on September 23rd 1965 (see paragraph 3).

Reduced Subscriptions under Bye-law 42

128. The subscriptions of 1,896 retired members were reduced to one guinea for the year 1964 under bye-law 42. (The number of subscriptions so reduced in 1963 was 1,561.) In addition a reduction of subscription to half-rate was allowed to twenty practising members under the special provision introduced in 1964. The Council is aware that increases in subscriptions may involve hardship for some members in reduced circumstances. It therefore intends when submitting proposals for subscription increases to members in September (see paragraph 3) to seek at the same time a widening of its discretionary power under bye-law 42 to reduce subscriptions.

Associated Funds – Report and Accounts 1964

129. The Council has decided, with a view to reducing the size and cost of its annual report which is circulated to all members, to publish a separate booklet entitled Associated Funds – Report and Accounts 1964 available to members on request and containing a supplementary report on the funds associated with the Institute, other than The Chartered Accountants Benevolent Association and The P. D. Leake Trust of which the reports and accounts are published separately. The booklet deals with the following funds and companies associated with the Institute:

(1) Chartered Accountants Retirement Benefits Scheme (CARBS). The insured retirement benefits scheme for members who are self-employed or otherwise within the ambit of section 22 of the Finance Act, 1956.
(2) Chartered Accountants Employees Superannuation Scheme (CAESS). The invested retirement benefits scheme for staffs of practising members.
(3) The Institute of Chartered Accountants Staff Pensions Fund. The invested retirement benefits scheme for members of the Institute secretariat.
(4) The Chartered Accountants General Charitable Trust. A general charity financed by the Institute to provide a source of grants to those charities with which the Council wishes to associate the Institute, to other Institute charities and for educational purposes prior to the creation of The Chartered Accountants Educational Foundation. During 1964 the Institute has contributed a total of £8,000 to the trust mainly for the purpose of financing students' society grants and other educational and research expenditure.
(5) The Research Foundation of the Institute. Created in February 1964 to finance accounting research organized by the Research Committee of the Council.
(6) The Chartered Accountants Educational Foundation. Created in October 1964 to finance Institute educational activities. On its creation the Institute transferred to the foundation the balance of £1,025 standing to the credit of the Student and Examination Account on December 31st, 1963. Application of the foundation's funds will be under the direction of a new committee of the Council called 'The Educational Grants Committee'.
(7) The Institute Prize Trust. To provide prizes for award at Institute examinations and to augment prizes awarded from the various endowed prize funds. Part of its funds have been contributed by benefactors to enable named prizes to be made available for award by local trustees.
(8) Endowed Prize Funds. To provide prizes for award at Institute examinations.
(9) Chartered Accountants Investment Pool for Educational Endowments (CAIPEE). A common investment scheme for educational charities in which the seventeen endowed prize funds and certain other charities with independent trustees participate.
(10) Companies. Chartered Accountants Trustees Ltd, which is trustee of the retirement benefits schemes and of other non-charitable trusts; Chartered Accountants Charities Ltd, which is trustee of the various charities; P. D. Leake Custodian Trustees Ltd, which holds investments of The P. D. Leake Trust; and A.C.A. Ltd, F.C.A. Ltd and The Society of Incorporated Accountants Ltd, which were formed for protective purposes.

Staff Retirements

132. Mr F. M. Wilkinson, F.C.A., a Joint Secretary, who had been on sick leave since March 1st, 1964, retired on December 31st, 1964, as a result of ill health. Mr Wilkinson joined the staff of the Institute in May 1944. He was appointed an Assistant Secretary in January 1946; Deputy Secretary in January 1960 and a Joint Secretary in November 1962. At its meeting on November 4th, 1964, the Council placed on record its appreciation of Mr Wilkinson's outstanding contribution to the work of the Institute.

133. Mr C. H. S. Loveday, F.C.A., an Under-Secretary, who joined the staff in 1935, retired on December 31st, 1964. At its meeting on January 6th, 1965, the Council placed on record its appreciation of Mr Loveday's service to the Institute over a period of twenty-nine years. Mr Loveday remains Secretary of The Chartered Accountants Benevolent Association.

134. Mrs W. M. Amor, an Assistant Secretary, who joined the Institute's staff in 1934, retired on December 31st, 1964, having completed thirty years' valuable service with the Institute.

Staff Appointments

135. Mr C. A. Evan-Jones, M.B.E., who joined the staff in 1957, and was appointed a Joint Secretary in November 1962, was appointed Secretary of the Institute with effect from January 1st, 1965.

136. Mr D. W. Hooper, M.A., F.C.A., took up his appointment as Technical Officer on November 23rd, 1964.

137. Mr H. R. Clark, F.C.A., joined the staff as an Assistant Secretary as from February 1st, 1965.

Appreciation

138. The Council again wishes to record its appreciation of the services rendered by members of the Institute who have given so much time as co-opted members of its committees and sub-committees; to the work of the Technical Advisory Committee; committees of the district societies and branches; courses; examinations and other activities on behalf of the Institute.

Auditors

139. The Council records with regret the death of Mr Leonard Walter Bingham, F.C.A., one of the Institute's auditors. His partner, Mr Bernard William Rivett, F.C.A., has been appointed by the Council under bye-law 117 to fill the vacancy until the 1965 annual meeting. Mr Leonard Pells, M.A., F.C.A., the other auditor, has intimated that he will not offer himself for reappointment in view of the election to the Council on January 6th, 1965, of his partner, Mr Douglas Spottiswoode Morpeth, B.COM., F.C.A. A resolution regarding the appointment of auditors for the ensuing year will be placed before members at the annual meeting on May 12th, 1965.

The revenue surplus of £1,025 on the Student and Examination Account for the year 1963 was transferred to the foundation at the time of its formation but, as the foundation has at present insufficient funds for the purpose, the revenue deficit of £4,697 for the year 1964 is being made good by the Institute. Discounted Cash Flow

SIR, – May I, as a mere practitioner and therefore not so intimately concerned with such problems as my brethren in commerce and industry, express my thanks to Mr A. S. Ashton for his very helpful paper reproduced in your issue of April 3rd entitled 'Capital Allowances Today – Are they being Fully Used?'

It was most refreshing to find that this was simply written in the English language without recourse to the pseudo-scientific Americanese 'gobbledygook' which now seems to be so much beloved by writers on the problems of higher management.

I was even able to understand the D.C.F. approach to the problem and I was more than delighted to learn that the writer had arrived at his figure of 10 per cent by a process of trial and error, rather than by the use of some involved formula.

This fact gave me peculiar joy because, for my sins, some years ago, at the time when profits tax was an allowable deduction before arriving at profits assessable to income tax, I used to have to arrive at the annual sum to be allotted to a staff profit sharing scheme after charging profits tax but before charging income tax. This sum I was only able to establish by a similar process of trial and error.

From the fact that Mr Ashton's D.C.F. rate of 10 per cent in his Table 4 works out so nearly to the figure of 9·2 per cent for the weighted average shown as the Book Rate of return in his Table 2, would it be correct to assume that there is some intimate relationship between these two rates, or is this only a coincidence?

Yours faithfully,

Cirencester. PHILIP K. PITT.

[Mr Ashton writes: I am grateful to Mr Pitt for his kind words. I also owe him an apology for not having devised a better example. There is no relation between the D.C.F. rate of return and the conventional return, and it is only a coincidence that my example produced results so close together. The sooner the cash flows back, the higher will be the D.C.F. return; whereas the conventional return is affected equally by good results in any year – whether it is two or twenty years ahead.]

Inter-Professional Women's Working Party

SIR, – We are writing to inform you that an inter-professional working party has been set up to study the careers of qualified women with particular reference to the so-called wastage.

The working party will study different aspects of the professional life of women particularly those which are common to all the professions. At the moment we are considering the position of the married woman in relation to taxation and are preparing a memorandum on expenses allowable for income tax, housekeeper allowance and surtax.

We believe especially that the cost to the professional woman of replacing herself in her home by the employment of domestic help makes it uneconomic, in many cases, for her to go out to work, and we are, therefore, seeking ways of alleviating the position.

The working party invites inquiries and opinions which should be addressed to the Honorary Secretary, Inter-Professional Working Party, c/o The Medical Women's Federation, Tavistock House North, Tavistock Square, London WC1.

Yours faithfully,

ANNE BOLTON,
(Chairman) THE MEDICAL WOMEN'S FEDERATION.

THE LEEDS, BRADFORD AND DISTRICT SOCIETY OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS

New President

Mr R. S. Wainwright, M.A., F.C.A., a partner in the firm of Beevers & Adgie, Chartered Accountants, of Leeds, has been elected President of The Leeds, Bradford and District Society of Chartered Accountants for 1965–66.

Mr Wainwright, who is aged 46, took his degree at Clare College, Cambridge (at which he was an Open Scholar), and was articled to his father – now retired – who was President of the Society in 1928. From 1939 to 1946 he served with the Friends' Ambulance Unit, at home and overseas. He has been a member of the Committee of The Leeds, Bradford and District Society since 1957 and has served as Hon. Secretary of the Leeds Tuition Committee, Chairman of the District Residential Course Committee, and Chairman of the Regional Technical Advisory Committee.

At the last General Election, Mr Wainwright, standing as a Liberal, came within 187 votes of winning the Colne Valley constituency of Yorkshire, held by Labour since 1935. He had previously served on the Liberal Party Taxation Committee, under the chairmanship of Prof. G. S. A. Wheatcroft, and is an elected Vice-President of the Liberal Party. He is also a director of the Rowntree Social Service Trust and a Governor of Ashville College, Harrogate.

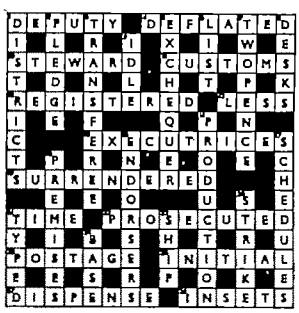
TEACHER TRAINING

Week-end Residential Course at Huddersfield

From April 8th to 11th, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, in association with the Huddersfield Training College for Technical Teachers, held a short course for teachers of accountancy at the College. The course was the first of its kind to be held and aroused considerable interest both inside and outside the profession.

The course commenced with an introductory talk by Mr A. H. Walton, F.C.A., a member of the Institute's Education Committee. The subjects of the lectures included learning and teaching (a brief review of the fundamentals of the learning process); the various ways of organizing teaching; the preparation of lessons and schemes of work; and techniques of securing student participation. The lectures were followed by question and discussion periods, and there were also two sessions of practice lessons.

Owing to numbers, students were split into three classes for these lessons, each group with its own tutor. The Institute's examinations were the subject of another session at which Mr J. S. Heaton, F.C.A., a member of the Institute's Examination Committee, was present. The course concluded with a discussion on programmed learning led by Mr E. C. Johnson, B.A., A.C.A., P. D. Leake Research Fellow designate at the University of Sheffield, and a general 'winding-up' session of questions and discussion. The course tutor was Mr A. Taylor, B.A., B.SC.(ECON.), A.C.I.S., Principal Lecturer in Business Studies at the College.

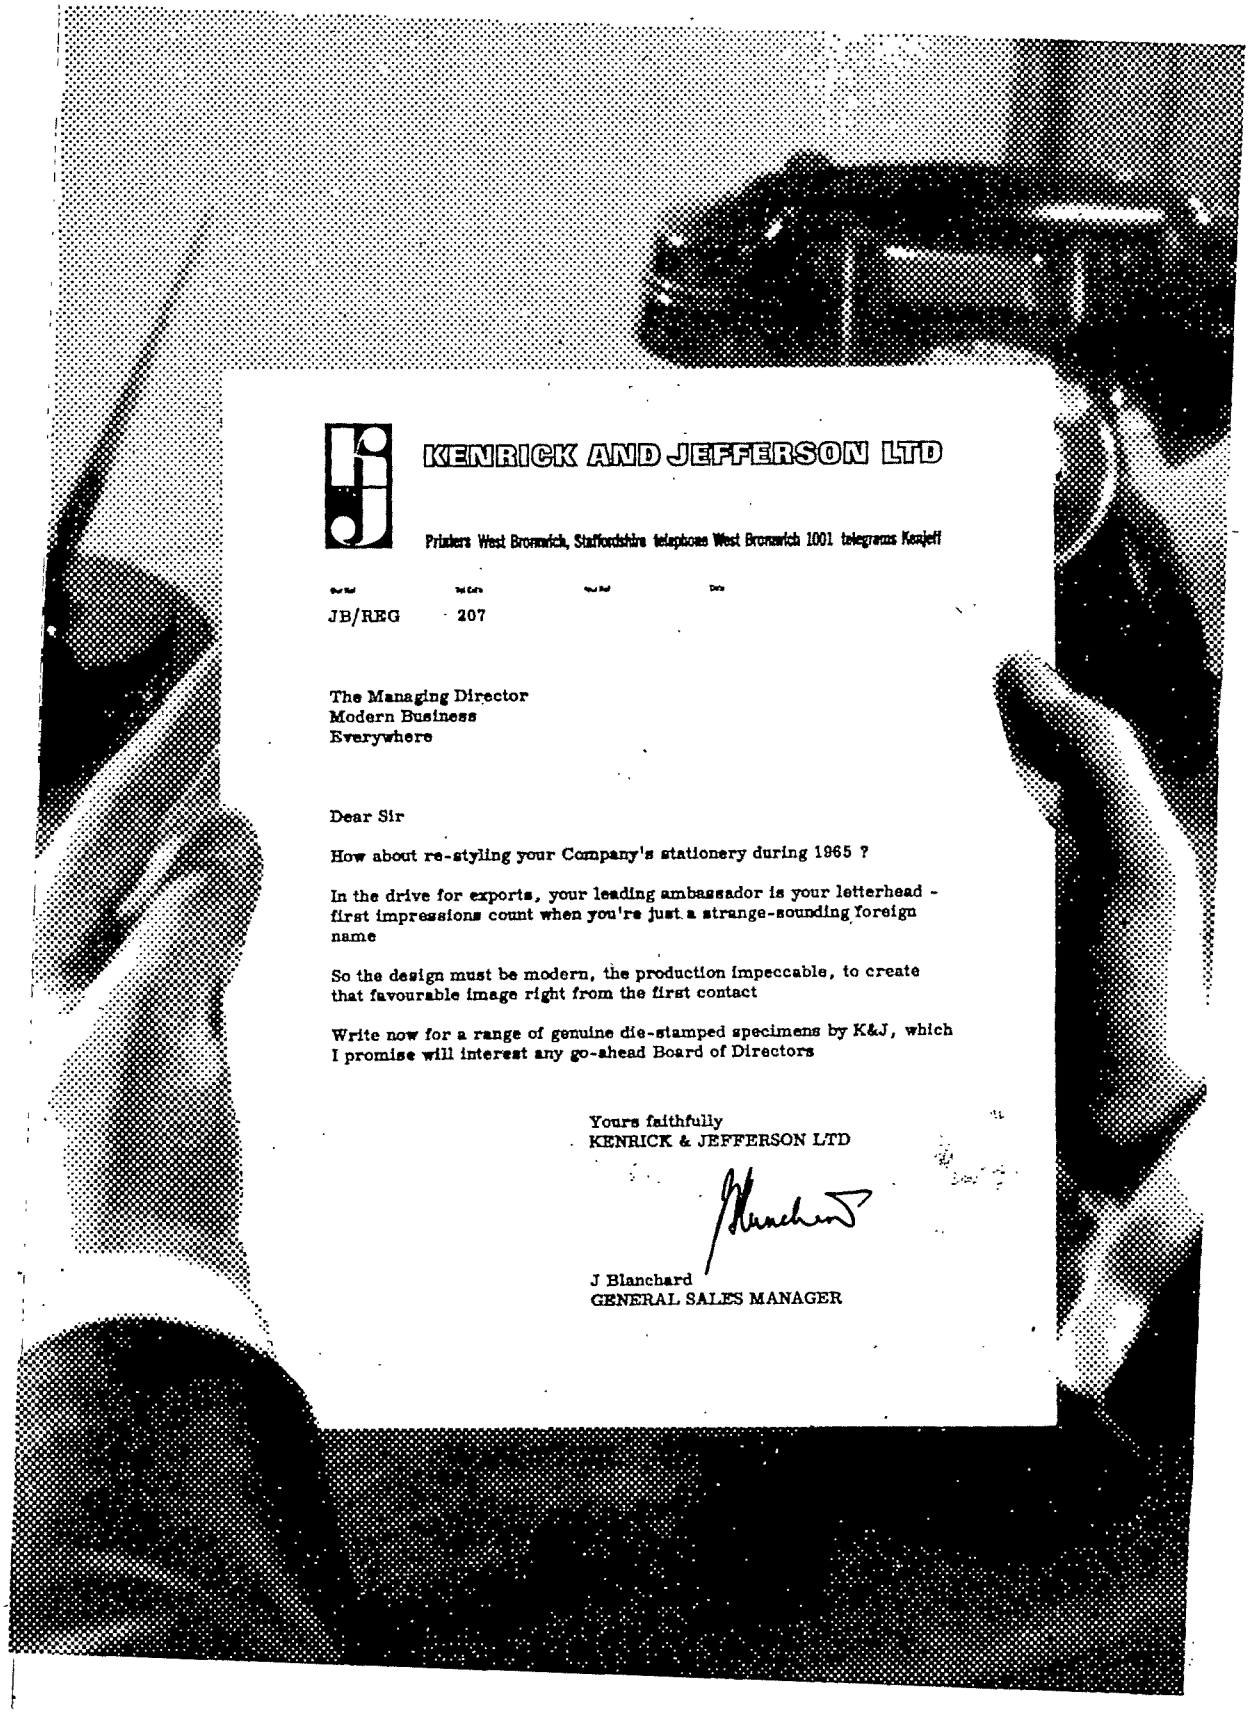


In a period of less than seventy-two hours it was not possible to cover the ground in depth. Nevertheless, short courses of this type are of considerable value. The active role assumed by the Institute is evidence that the leaders of the accountancy profession are fully appreciative of the need for more trained teachers of accountancy.

There has recently been a considerable increase in the number of chartered accountants who hold full-time or part-time teaching appointments in colleges of commerce and in technical colleges and the indications are that in the near future the growth in the demand for technical teachers will be more rapid in the sphere of business education than anywhere else.

It is anticipated that the Institute will arrange further courses for teachers of accountancy at different levels of experience and at different centres.

CROSSWORD SOLUTION



The solution to the Accountants' Crossword compiled by Mr Kenneth Trickett, F.C.A., which appeared in last week's issue, is as follows:

Correction

In our note in the April 3rd issue referring to the Third Australian Chartered Accountants' Congress to be held from May 31st to June 4th, we regret that we inadvertently described Mr L. A. Braddock as President of the Australian Institute; Mr Braddock is President of the Australian Society of Accountants and is not, in fact, a member of the Institute. The President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Australia is, of course, Mr T. C. Boehme, F.C.A.

Illustrations of Management Accounts in Practice

By
A. G. B. BURNEY
O.B.E., B.A., F.C.A.

Part A of this book explains a number of management accounting statements designed to assist various levels of management in controlling their costs. Part B describes the detailed costing and accounting procedures which enable the statements for a medium-size manufacturing concern to be prepared.

The emphasis is on practical management accounts, inasmuch as all the statements were designed for the everyday use of the managements concerned.

It is possible in this book to study a complete system of management accounting starting with the setting up of the necessary standard costs and budgets. The entries in the costing and accounting records are also shown together with the statements for top management, departmental managers and foremen. The system shows that the costing and financial accounts are integrated and reconciled.

Students should find this book useful reading for their examinations as it shows how theory and principles are applied in practice. Accountants in industry, whether they have experience of management accounting or not, should derive benefit from the experience of others.

As a practising accountant, the author has advised a number of businesses wishing to establish systems of management accounting. His experience in this field will be of interest to other practising accountants who are being increasingly called upon to assist their clients in this way.

Those responsible for providing training and experience for accountants will be interested in the author's view that accountants should become more closely associated with the problems of departmental managers and shop foremen as well as those of top management if they are to satisfy the needs of all levels of management for cost control information.

This book is therefore recommended reading for the growing body of students, accountants and managements who would like to become more familiar with practical management accounts.

DYNAMIC ACCOUNTING

EUGEN SCHMALENBACH

Translated from the German by
G. W. MURPHY, B.A.(Com.), F.C.A., J.P., and KENNETH S. MOST, LL.B., A.C.A.

In a time when accounting is wholly dominated by taxation concepts, it appears urgently necessary to clarify constantly the process of economic growth which accounts should and can really reveal. There is no book which presents these principles more clearly than this standard work.

For the present-day business man the financial accounts are no longer a presentation of the state o his capital. They are an instrument of management which gives him prompt and reliable information about the consequences of his managerial activity. He needs information less urgently on the state of his capital. More important to him is the knowledge that his business is producing profits and how these profits have developed throughout the business year. Schmalenbach takes account of these practical requirements. His approach has prevailed in all significant matters; it corresponds to a large extent with the requirements of business finance at the present time. The book is not only important for students but also belongs as a standard work in the library of every member of the accounting and auditing profession.

The translators believe Schmalenbach's Dynamic Accounting fills a gap in English accounting literature. It will be valuable to the qualified accountant as well as the student as a classical explanation of accounting theory and practice. The book has been the most popular textbook in Germany and Austria for many years and there is no doubt that the author has made one of the outstanding contributions to the exposition of this subject.

The twelve editions of this book which have been produced in Germany are witness to its popularity with generations of accountants on the Continent and its influence can be traced as far as Australasia, Japan and America.

BUILDERS' COST CONTROL BONUSING AND ACCOUNTS

F. BRANDWOOD, A.C.W.A., A.M.B.I.M.

Written by an Accountant who has had many years' experience in the Building and Civil Engineering Industry, the book is designed to bring modern techniques in accountancy and costing to the industry.

It is divided into three main sections:

(1) The financial accounting aspect.

(2) Cost control incorporating standard costing principles, and describing a system giving management financial and productivity control over the whole of its contracts.

(3) The practical application of bonusing including the individual, gang and comprehensive systems.

The book will, by reason of its range, appeal to management in firms of all sizes, and should be of considerable use to Lecturers and Students in the Building Finance and Administration Courses, particularly as it is supported by a large selection of typical examination questions.
